ENTERED according to Act of the Parliament of Canada, in the year one thousand nine hundred and five, by WILLIAM BRIGGS, at the Department of Agriculture.

PREFACE.

WHEN the few short papers on the first colony in the North-West were put into book-form, under the title of "The Selkirk Settlers in Real Life," the book received a welcome far beyond its intrinsic deserts, because it gave some idea of how the early settlers lived in their homes rather than the ordinary history of contemporary events. Letters received from readers far and near, as well as verbal communications, have given me to feel that people are anxious to get glimpses of the moving actors in the human drama as an aid to understanding the events commonly known as the history of the country.

Preface.

Hence, many who took deep interest in the simple story of the early colony on the Red River, were anxious that a record of the life succeeding those early days should be written by some one who was an eye-witness of the change from the old life to the new, as well as of the subsequent stirring events in the formative period of Western history. In answer to these requests, and with a desire to preserve a life-story of the land in which I was born and in which I have thus far spent my life, these chapters have been written. I have had neither the time nor the desire to write a compendium of all the events that have transpired in the country, nor to give minute details of all I have mentioned. I have sought rather to dwell upon men and events only so far-as a record of them seemed to me to be relevant to my purpose, as expressed in the title of this book. I have simply gone back and lived through the past again, seeing the faces and hearing the voices of other days, and what I have seen and heard I have herein written.

It is hoped that the present work will give a sufficiently succinct account of the progress of the country through its formative stages, and at the same time have enough of personal reminiscence about it to make the dry bones of history more palatable to the taste of the ordinary reader than they might otherwise be.

Should it appear to some that certain things they deem of importance have been omitted, such will kindly bear in mind the scope this book contemplates, and they can fill out the incompleteness by themselves taking up the pen and traversing fields which this work does not occupy. It is in such way after all that a complete history is secured, for every man has his own peculiar point of view, if he has realized the meaning of individuality. The Canadian West has little more than begun a great history.

Preface.

We who have lived here always have but heard by anticipation,

“ . . . the tread of pioneers
Of nations yet to be,
The first low wash of waves where yet Shall roll a human sea ”— and perhaps the present writing by one who was at the very beginning may be of interest.

PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION

THE demand for this book having continued active long after it was out of print, a revised and enlarged edition is now issued. The original purpose of the book, as announced in the preface to the first edition, was to give some personal account of the making of the West into a part of Canada. We still adhere to this purpose. An exhaustive and detailed history is not attempted; but the time-spirit is studied, and an effort is made to bring the reader into contact with the personality of the men who were the makers of the country in its formative stages. It is hoped that the book may prove interesting and helpful not only to those who are familiar with the course of events, but to those who are now coming into the West, and who will naturally wish to know something of its early history.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

FOR those who are not familiar with the history of the West that precedes the period at which this book begins, we prefix a brief note.

The great domain now known as the Canadian West was for long years the preserve of fur-trading companies. The Hudson's Bay Company was chartered in 1670, and given practically an absolute control over the whole region. The North-West Company was organized at Montreal in 1773-74, but became at once more aggressive than the older organization in pushing its operations and explorations into the interior of the western country, and even out to the Pacific. At the opening of the nineteenth century the Earl of Selkirk was governor and controlling force in the Hudson's Bay Company. Mainly for philanthropic reasons, but partly also in the interests of his company, he brought out from the north of Scotland a band of colonists who, settling on the Red River from 1812-15 as they arrived, became known to history as the Selkirk colonists. Amongst these colonists of 1815, and coming as a lad of fifteen, was my father. This fact is stated here that my essaying to write a book on western history may not seem presumptuous; for I was born in the Selkirk Colony, and spent all my life until a few months ago in different parts of that country—from the Red River to the Pacific Coast.

The Selkirk Colony had no sooner settled on the Red River than the North-West Company, looking upon it as a base of supply for their rivals, determined to drive the settlers out. Thus began the struggle of these early colonists. They not only had to contend against the difficulties of climate, supplemented by floods and grasshopper plagues, but were constantly buffeted about by the North-West Company and their semi-savage allies. The record of the colony is one of unexampled endurance in the face of untoward conditions.

The rivalry between the two companies reached a climax in 1816, when they came into armed conflict at Seven Oaks, on the Red River, where Governor Semple, of the Hudson's Bay Company, and several of the company's servants and some of the settlers were killed. The Imperial Government interfered in the interests of the peace of the country, and some four years afterwards the two rival organizations united under the name of the older company. From that time on there was comparative peace on the Red River.

Besides the Selkirk colonists, there was a considerable population in the country outside the Indians. This population was largely French, or of French extraction through inter-marriage with the native tribes.

These French and French half-breeds lived a more nomadic life than the Selkirk settlers, and were for the most part engaged for a portion of each year, if not the whole of it, in trading and hunting on the great plains. Except for contact with the United States, through their freighting for the Hudson's Bay Company to and from St. Paul and St. Cloud, these people of the West lived almost untouched by the outside world till the sixties. Then travellers westward began to discover the enormous possibilities of the country, and statesmen of the recently formed Confederation of Canada began to discuss the advisability of securing the new land for the Dominion.

THE MAKING OF THE CANADIAN WEST.

CHAPTER I.

MUSINGS ON THE OLD.

It was not to be expected that the great domain of British America west of the inland sea of Superior would remain for an indefinitely long period under the sway of a fur-trading company, however paternal and beneficent to those under its care that sovereignty might be. Nor was it likely that the westward course of empire would fail to extend over the vast area which has been aptly described as the very home of the wheat plant, and which has become in its several parts the great producer of the staff of life, the grazing ground for innumerable herds, as well as the cynosure on which the eyes of the mineral-seeking world are now fixed. I never have had any sympathy with the somewhat generally accepted view that the Hudson's Bay Company, who since the year 1670 had partially, and from 1821 had absolutely, controlled most of this wide region, was the determined and active opponent of its settlement and progress.

Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal (Donald A. Smith), in his excellent preface to my former book on "The Selkirk Settlers in Real Life," puts the matter in such capital form that I cannot do better than reproduce here his paragraph on the point: "It has been the custom," says His Lordship, "to describe the Hudson's Bay Company as an opponent of individual settlement and of colonization. To enter into a controversy upon this point is not my purpose, but it may be proper to state that the condition of affairs at the time in question in the country between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains does not appear to have been sufficiently appreciated. Owing to the difficulty of access and egress, colonization in what is now Manitoba and the North-West Territories could not have taken place to any extent. Of necessity, also, the importation of the commodities required in connection with its agricultural development would have been exceptionally expensive, while, on the other hand, the cost of transportation of its possible exports must have been so great as to render competition with countries more favorably situated at the moment difficult if not impossible. The justice of these contentions will be at once realized when it is remembered that the Red River valley was situated in the centre of the continent, one thousand miles away in any direction from settled districts.

. . . Personally, it is my opinion that the acquisition and development of the Hudson Bay Territory was impossible prior to the confederation of the Dominion. No less a body than united Canada could have acquired and administered so large a domain, or have undertaken the construction of railways, without which its development could only have been slow and uncertain. It was not until 1878, eight years after the transfer, that Winnipeg first received railway communication through the United States. Three or four more years elapsed before the completion of the line to Lake Superior, and it was only late in 1885—sixteen years after the Hudson's Bay Company relinquished their charter—that the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed from ocean to ocean, and Manitoba and the North-West Territories were placed in direct and regular communication with the different parts of the Dominion."

In addition to what His Lordship thus tells us, in a statement whose form and contents will commend it to every sensible person who is at all cognizant of the conditions referred to therein, it remains to be said, from the standpoint of the people who then lived in the country, that so far as my recollection and information go, they made no active effort to remove what might be called by some the "invidious bar" of their isolation, if we except the action of a few of the adventurer class—a class always ready to exploit frontier communities for their own glory. Why should it be reasonably thought that the people of that time, along the banks of the Red and Assiniboine rivers and out on the great plains, would make any special effort to bring in the flood of that larger life which, from the older settled portions of the continent, was beginning to beat up against their borders? The conditions under which those people lived were for the most part the best they knew, and, speaking generally, they were contented and happy under the regime of the Hudson's Bay Company, especially as that company did not latterly insist on monopoly in trade. The community, before the transfer, might be roughly divided into two classes, if we except those who during the sixties had come from without into their midst.

The Selkirk settlers and those of their class (who composed the one part) would not, so far at least as the older generation was concerned, be eager for more struggles and wrenchings. For years after coming to the country their life had been one of grim and incessant conflict with all manner of difficulties. Not only were they met again and again by the deadly hostility and persecution of the North-West Fur Company, who were determined to destroy the colony brought out under the care of their rivals in trade; not only had locust plagues and epidemics assailed them with ruinous force, but the very elements seemed so unfriendly to people unaccustomed to the climatic conditions, that more than ten long years from their first coming had passed before they had any means of livelihood other than the fish or fowl or products of the chase they might oftentimes with great hardship and suffering secure. Even following those ten years they had scarcely got their homes built and their little plots sowed, when, after the "long and cruel winter" of 1826, the raging Red swept everything they owned before its frothing current into Lake Winnipeg. Is it any wonder that when they got fairly settled, the old men who had come through this magnificent struggle felt that now when their sinews had been tamed by age and trouble and their heads frosted with the unmelting snows, they were entitled to that decade of rest that rounds out the threescore years and ten?

And so it was that the older of them, while loyal to every British institution that might be set up in their midst, and while anxious to do what was best for their children, waited in the lengthening shadows for the sunset, and neither clamored for changed conditions nor took much active part in them when those conditions began to obtain. The younger people amongst them, it is true—many of whom, as I have said in my former volume, had gone to eastern institutions of learning and had come back with some knowledge of life's possibilities under different conditions; and others of whom had, in freighting expeditions, tapped the arteries of business and got the taste of commercial blood—were not averse to the incoming of the new life when circumstances would be ripe for its advent.

The other part of the community was composed largely of the bois-brûlés—the adventurous hunters and traders of the time—and these could have no special interest in pressing for the opening of the country to the newer civilization. From their childhood these men had roamed over this great area with a lordly sense of ownership. Without any let or hindrance they had followed the buffalo over the trackless prairie; they had trapped the fur-bearing animals in the forest and on the plains; they had fished in the great lakes and rivers, and in the midst of it all had lived in the enjoyment of a satisfying, if rude, abundance. No one who ever saw one of these plain hunters come in to Fort Garry after the season's work on the Saskatchewan, could fail to see that he was a person in exceedingly comfortable material circumstances. In his train he had any number of carts (with ponies for each and to spare), and these were laden with the choicest viands in the shape of buffalo meat, marrow fat, beaver-tail, etc., while he also had a goodly supply of furs that would bring handsome prices. Besides his ponies, he had several choice horses of the larger breed for buffalo runners; and camping with his family and following in their cosy tents on the prairie, he was as independent as a feudal baron in the brave days of old. Under such circumstances these men were not likely to be active in securing the advent of conditions that would circumscribe their domain; but neither they nor any other class of the population were predisposed to put obstacles in the way of any incoming system that would pay due regard to the rights of those who were in the country before its advent.

Summing up the whole situation, then, it would seem that things had to take their normal course, and that circumstances were shaping so that in the fulness of time the West was to come to its majority and clothe itself in the garments of national citizenship. The number of people from the eastern provinces who began looking westward, and the increase of publications concerning the country by those visiting it, directed the attention of statesmen to its great possibilities, and prepared the way for the movement that secured the "Great Lone Land" as a part of the Dominion of Canada.

CHAPTER II.

PATHOS AND PERILS OF CHANGE.

THERE is always a strong element of pathos in the way in which the people who have been in undisputed and absolute possession of a country, realize that limitations are being put upon them by the incoming of new population and new conditions. A few years ago it was my privilege to be present on an island in one of our western lakes when the Indians of the district were assembled for the annual treaty payment and the usual supply of rations. Everyone knows how fairly and honorably the Indians of the West have been treated by the Government, and, for the most part, by their agents, and we all realize how the progress of the world and the good of mankind necessitate the acquisition of the land from those who have not had the training or the opportunity required to fully develop its resources; but, withal, the scene at one of these Indian treaties has its sadness for the thoughtful onlooker. As the men who had once been lords of the isles and lakes sat meekly round in a circle to receive each his handful of flour and piece of bacon for the mid-day meal, one could not help feeling that our duty as a Christian people is not wholly done when we bestow a meal, pay a few dollars and provide a reservation. The children of the wild, upon whose heritage we have entered, must become the wards of the nation and the charge of the Church of Christ, that their declining days may be cheered and brightened in the noblest sense.

As one of an armed force I have witnessed the surrender of princely Crees and Chipewyans beyond the banks of the North Saskatchewan—many of them men of magnificent mould and royal bearing—who had been incited to rebellion by people who should have known better. When these misguided men laid down their arms and were guarded by our wakeful pickets, thoughts of pity for their unhappy predicament filled the minds of their guards in the watches of the night. These Indians must be taught by force, if need be, the wrong of rebellion against a rightly constituted authority that is disposed to treat them fairly; and above all, they must be taught the sacredness of human life. But seeing that in the interests of progressive civilization we have policed the plains over which they once roamed as "monarchs of all they surveyed," that we have placed limitations upon them to which they were wholly unaccustomed, and which were not provided for in their own dark code of ethics, we ought to be more ready to follow them with the blessings of peace than with the waste of the sword.

These somewhat extreme examples will serve to illustrate our opening sentence as to the element of pathos present when people who have had illimitable range begin to find themselves circumscribed, even though this narrowing of the field is for their own ultimate good. They give us to understand how the white settlers by the banks of the Red and Assiniboine rivers, though perfectly ready to acquiesce in the new order of things beginning to obtain amongst them, would feel that a great change was coming over the spirit of their dream. Those who know what the old order had been realize how completely in many ways it was to be reversed, and hence how carefully and judiciously the Government of Canada, and those who professed to be its agents, should have acted in bringing the change to pass. For those settlers, once they had conquered their earlier difficulties, life had been singularly peaceable and uneventful. Its central points outside the home, with all its guileless hospitality and simplicity, were the church and school, both of which bulked far more largely with them than some people in these days of complex society seem able to understand.

They were without the vexation and the heart-burning of active politics, they were ignorant of taxation in any form, while the rivalries that existed were in keeping with their simple life, and had nothing of that fierce element of competition into which the newer civilization was to hurl them. The contests that had been most in evidence were over such matters as the speed of horses, in regard to which the settlement would often be deeply stirred, especially if the horses were owned in different parts of the colony. There was sometimes a great deal of strength put into efforts to be first with the seeding, harvest, hay-cutting, hay-hauling or freighting expeditions. It was the ambition of many households always to have breakfast by candle-light, that they might have a good deal done before their more tardy neighbors arose. In the matter of hay-hauling we used to get up in the night, and going out to the yard, where the oxen had been tied to the carts, grope round in the darkness to get them hitched up, now and then pausing to listen whether we could hear the creaking music that betokened the departure of our neighbor's cart-train to the hay swamps. Friendly contests in feats of physical strength were very common. The number of bags of wheat a man could carry on his back, the quantity of shot-bags he could lift over his head, the weight he could hang to his little finger and then write his name on the wall with a coal, the number of loads of hay he could cut with a scythe in a day, or the number of "stooks" of wheat he could handle with a sickle—these were some of the rivalries that gave zest to the simple life of the early days. The school was another field for competition, and on the great days of oral examination the parents and friends were present as eager and interested spectators of the contest which decided who was the best reader, writer, etc., in the district.

In the business life of the people there was nothing tumultuous. There were no banks and no promissory notes—on the latter of which they would have looked with contempt as on something implying distrust in a man's word of honor. The general stores, either of the Hudson's Bay Company or of individual dealers, were not clamorous for business, as there was no compelling force of competition. Frequently on going to one of these stores you had to look up the proprietor, who, leaving the store to take care of itself, was out attending to his horse, or something of that sort. When you went into a store there was no modern clerk to advance with an alluring smile; indeed, the proprietor or clerk might even say that he had not the article asked for, until the customer would wander round and find it for himself. No wrapping paper was used, and you had either to bring a bag with you, buy some cotton, or leave your tea and sugar on the counter.

Think of a community like that being suddenly confronted with the necessity for political strife, with the prospect of municipal government and taxation, with all the keen and sometimes bitter rivalries of present-day business methods, and with, alas, some adventurers all too ready to take advantage of their simple-heartedness, and no one will wonder if it took the people some little time to gather themselves up and accommodate their lives to such new conditions.

But more important in its bearing upon the feeling of the people was the sudden realization of the fact that, after long years of undisputed possession of large privileges on the great areas around them, limitations were being put upon their operations by the incoming of strangers, who, driving stakes here and there, barred the old ways and the old fields—sometimes unjustly—against a people who could only be expected to learn slowly that their domain must some time be curtailed. There was an element of pathos, and yet, withal, of sound reason in all this, in view of which those who were bringing in the new conditions would have done well to exercise a caution and care they did not always manifest. Add to this the fact that oftentimes it was discovered that the persons who, by show of authority, sometimes excluded the settlers from places, had themselves no rightful claim, and one should not be surprised if the settlers under such circumstances were in some unrest as to the future. I remember, for instance, how the hay meadows to which the settlers had come for many years, with the marking out of a “circle” as the only condition precedent to holding all within it, were closed against them by people who, coming from the village around Fort Garry, desired to hold these meadows for their own profit. If they had just claim it was all right, but if they had not their action was resented. The settlers, however, were nct slow to seize the situation, and some incidents took place which showed, to the disgust of the discomfited, that they could hold their own. The "green knoll swamp," lying between the Kildonan settlers and Stony Mountain, was a favorite source of hay supply, and new-comers, finding this out, often came round with formidable papers to frighten the settlers away from their accustomed haunts. A friend of mine still relates with great relish that one day, just as he and the people of his immediate neighborhood were starting into hay-cutting there, an important-looking stranger with a large retinue of men, mowers, rakes, etc., bore down upon him, and with book in hand asked him in great wrath who the people were who dared to come upon this land, as he wished to have them arrested for trespass. The settler, standing upon his mower, told him that the Gunns, McDonalds, MacBeths, Pritchards, Harpers and Sutherlands were visible. All these names were taken down with tremendous emphasis by the irate gentleman, who expected that the settler would at once warn his neighbors, and that he and they would "fold their tents like the Arabs, and silently steal away" from the coveted hay-fields. In this, however, the new-comer was mistaken, for the settler coolly went on to say,

"You have not yet taken me down in your book. My name is Francis Murray," upon which the man "with curses not loud but deep," seeing that his game was understood, took himself away and was not again heard from.

Besides all this, some of the new arrivals, who had been hospitably entertained by the settlers with their best, wrote to eastern papers ridiculing the manner of life and the accommodation they found amongst them, and made reference to the dark-skinned people under the somewhat contemptuous name of "breeds." The number, of course, who did any of these things was small, but their conduct offended and estranged many who, ignorant of the fact that such people were only the excrescences on the better life of the older provinces, somewhat guardedly awaited further developments.

In the meantime matters were shaping in the direction of a confederation in Canada,—and when that movement, beginning in the Maritime districts, had spread westward, the great statesmen of all parties, dropping their minor differences, united nobly in accomplishing it, so that in the year 1867 the older provinces came together into one federation with provincial autonomy in regard to certain matters. This task once finished it would seem as if Canadian statesmen looked round for fresh worlds to conquer, and as the great West was beginning to attract attention, steps were taken in the Dominion Parliament to secure through the Imperial Government the surrender by the Hudson's Bay Company of their charter in Rupert's Land. This charter they had held for some two hundred years, and they naturally declined to give it up without compensation for the loss they would sustain by relinquishing claim to the vast territory it covered. Instructed by the Dominion Government, Sir George E. Cartier and the Hon. William Macdougall proceeded to England, and arrangements were concluded for the transfer of the North-West to Canada. The Hudson's Bay Company were to receive £300,000 sterling, certain reservations around their posts, and about one-twentieth of the lands in the territory as thereafter surveyed, and were therefor to surrender their charter to the Imperial Government; the latter were to transfer the territory to the Government of Canada, who in their turn undertook to respect and conserve the rights of the people in the area thus added to the Dominion. This arrangement was concluded in the spring of 1869, and it was then expected that the purchase money would be paid on the 1st of October following, and that probably on the 1st day of December the Queen's Proclamation would issue, setting forth these facts and fixing the date of the actual transfer of the North-West to Canada.

So far all was well. The ideas leading to the acquisition of this great territory were in every sense statesmanlike, and if carefully carried out were calculated to be of the greatest benefit to the people in the new territory and to the Dominion as well. We cannot too thankfully pay tribute unstinted to the men whose ideals were for an ever-widening horizon, and who felt that "no pent-up Utica should confine the powers" of the young nation just beginning to stretch out and exercise its giant limbs. Once the older provinces were brought into a Confederation it was wise to look forward to a Canada extending from ocean to ocean, and to take the necessary legal steps to secure the West as part of the Dominion. But just there, after the negotiations with the Hudson's Bay Company through the Imperial Government were well in hand and were being wisely concluded, the Canadian authorities seem to have blundered by overlooking the fact that the new territory had a population of some ten thousand people, who ought at least to have been informed in some official way of the bargain that was being made, and of the steps being taken to secure and guard their rights and privileges.

Rumors of the transaction certainly reached the Red River through unauthoritative sources, only to produce uneasiness there. Before the transfer was completed men were sent out to open roads from the Lake of the Woods into the settlement. Surveying parties entered the new territory and went hither and thither, driving their stakes and erecting their mounds, to the bewilderment of the people, and, to cap all, a governor was despatched to the Red River before the old Government was in any sense superseded and before a Queen's Proclamation, which would have been instantly recognized by all classes of the community, was issued. The Selkirk settlers and other people of that class, however perplexed at the procedure, had the utmost confidence that the Canadian authorities would ultimately do substantial justice in the recognition of all just and lawful claims and privileges enjoyed by the inhabitants of the new territory, and hence awaited patiently, though somewhat anxiously, the developments of time. But the French half-breeds (commonly called "the French" in the Red River Colony)—more fiery and easily excited, more turbulent of spirit and warlike in disposition, accustomed to passages at arms with any who would cross their path, and withal, as a class, less well-informed on current events than their white brethren—were not satisfied with a course that seemed to them to place their rights in jeopardy, and so they rose up in a revolt that, alas, while possibly accomplishing some of the objects which should have been reached by constitutional means, left its red stream across the page of our history.

CHAPTER III.

ARMED REBELLION.

"THE French are off to drive back the Governor!" These words, somewhat excitedly uttered by one of my brothers, and addressed to my father, made up the first intimation I, a lad of ten summers, had that something serious was on foot; yet I recall the exact words as distinctly as if they had been spoken yesterday, and most of the acts in the drama of the rebellion whose actual outbreak they announced are indelibly stamped upon my memory. It was in October, 1869, and my brother had just come home from the morning service in Kildonan church, over which upon that day the shadow of the situation had been cast, perhaps to the serious detriment of devout and undivided worship. The fact that the news first came to us in this way throws a curious sidelight on the primitive life of the time. The churchyard was the modern representative of the Athenian market-place, so far as the giving and receiving of news was concerned. The settlement had no telegraphic communication with the outside world; the solitary post-office was miles away, and mails, in any case, were few and far apart. A few of the people subscribed for an eastern paper, which was comparatively old before it reached its destination, and the local paper was doubtless often greatly at a loss for "copy." Moreover, it must be remembered that in certain seasons of the year the settlers were away from home haying, wood-cutting, etc., during the whole week. Saturday evening, however, they were all back. A general brushing-up was in order, and on Sabbath morning, except in cases of sickness or some similar cause, they were all wending their way in good time to the church.

"What's the latest news?" was a question frequently heard, and the men often gathered in knots in the churchyard before the service that they might get abreast of the times. Some stay-at-home man, perhaps the school-teacher, who was always looked upon as a species of encyclopædia, or someone who was in touch with the inhabitants of Fort Garry, "held the floor," and gave what information he could as to current events. The Sabbatarian ideas of these people were, for the most part, strict enough; but I suppose they looked on this parliament as a sort of family gathering to talk over family affairs, and as a general thing the news imparted was not startling enough to disturb that air of devoutness which they sought to cultivate when they entered the portals of the place of worship. But on the day just mentioned the intelligence was of unusual moment, and, perchance, may have deepened the earnestness with which they joined in the prayer for the preservation of peace to Him "who breaketh the bow in sunder and burneth the chariot in the fire."

"The French are off to drive back the Governor!" repeated my brother, fresh from the churchyard conclave, and though it was the first I recall hearing of active trouble, doubtless the announcement was not wholly unexpected by my father. It seemed that for some weeks previous to this Louis Riel, who was to have the "bad eminence" of leading two rebellions, had been holding meetings amongst the French half-breeds, and, doubtless, moved by others far and near, had been delivering fiery orations in regard to the rumored changes which he claimed were to put in jeopardy all the rights they held dear. It may as well be admitted that the situation, as they saw it, gave him some plausible ground on which to work. The difficulty of conveying reliable information from the outside world to the settlement must not be overlooked; but we repeat that it now seems passing strange that the Government of Canada did not in some way get official word to the settlers before sending forward a governor, and letting loose in the territory some not over-prudent persons who claimed to be the agents of the Dominion. Had some man as widely known and respected in the country as Donald A. Smith, who, coming afterwards, even when the revolt was at white heat, did so much to secure peace—had such a man been sent at that stage, the face of our history might have been changed.

But these are large provisos; and, in the absence of any such precautions, the signal fires for rebellion were lit on the banks of the Red River, and called sympathizers from out on the great plains. Add to the situation as it was the fact that Riel had commanding influence over those French half-breeds, and we find additional explanation for the uprising. His father, who lived many years in St. Boniface, and was sometimes called "the Miller of the Seine," from his having a mill on that little tributary to the Red, had been an idolized leader amongst them, and the son inherited much of his immense energy and eloquence. Moreover, it must be remembered that Riel's fiery speeches fell upon very inflammable material. These men were naturally of stormy spirit—daring rough-riders of the plains, who brooked no interference from anyone, and who had passed through many a conflict with their darker brethren on the wild wastes of the West. Once get men of that sort to feel that they are fighting for their homes and the rights of their families, put modern weapons into their hands, and in their own kind of warfare they are dangerous men to attack. Being of that stamp, and being made to feel that they were to be trodden upon, they rose in armed insurrection; and, as a first step, went on the errand noted in the opening words of this chapter. No one can defend an act such as theirs, even had it not led to some of the deplorable events which followed. Though many can see extenuating circumstances, armed rebellion is a serious business; and if there is a place for it in the present state of the world, it is when all constitutional means have been exhausted, and people accomplish a revolution in the face of some iniquitous and tyrannous government. Tubal Cain's offensive weapon is an instrument of last resort, only to be taken up when every other arbitrament has failed; and this we say, though we agree “That while Oppression lifts its head,

Or a tyrant would be lord,
While we may thank him for the plough,
We won't forget the sword.”

But the case before us was far short of that. At best Riel and his men were starting to fight the shadows of events which might never come, even though those shadows seemed to their kindled imaginations to be portents of dire disasters heading in their direction. No threat had been made against these people, and they should have known that no act of robbery or of deprivation of rights had ever been permitted ultimately by the flag under whose folds they were to be governed. Besides, they had no right to assume to speak for the whole country before consulting with others who lived in it. Why did they not take counsel with the Selkirk settlers and men of that class who, being of less nomadic habits, had larger settled interests in the territory, and who, moreover, had always been better informed as to events that were transpiring? Why did they not see whether some concerted and peaceful action on the part of the whole population could not be planned to attain the ends in view and conserve the rights of the inhabitants which seemed to be threatened? And yet, though we ask these questions, we cannot be justly bitter towards the mass of the rebels at that stage. They were easily imposed upon and led by many who should have counselled peace, and notably by the ill-starred man who, twenty-five years afterwards, selfishly offered to give up the struggle for alleged popular rights in exchange for a sum of money for himself. Whether Louis Riel had all his senses or not God only knoweth, and now that he has gone beyond the bar of human judgment, we pronounce not whether in our opinion he was knave or lunatic, or partly both. We give some of the facts concerning him in the following pages, and let the reader bring in a verdict if he chooses so to do.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PLOT THICKENS.

THE first overt act of rebellion was committed when an armed and organized force, on the 21st of October, 1869, took possession of the highway near the Salle River, between Fort Garry and the international boundary. By this route the Hon. Wm. Macdougall and his staff would have entered the territory in the normal course of things, but the rebels put an effectual stop to the programme by interposing on the one great roadway an obstacle which the Governor's aide is reported as having somewhat irreverently designated "a blawsted fence." A fence extending only a few yards each way across a roadway in a prairie district that can be travelled in almost any direction need not necessarily prevent people from traversing the country, but this one erected upon that highway was in tangible form a declaration that the armed men who erected it had made up their minds to oppose the entrance of the new régime into the territory. At this primitive barricade a large body of men were camped, with horses at hand for service at any moment, and they let down or put up the bars according as they viewed with approval or otherwise the passing of any who came that way.

It was the regular travelled route of the freighters from the United States to Fort Garry, and the force at the fence examined all the cart and waggon trains. The commissariat had to be supplied, and while dry goods were allowed to pass without much detention, the articles of moister texture and of edible description were quite freely confiscated to the use of the camp. The mail-bags they also diligently examined in search of documents that might furnish plausible excuse for the uprising, and to prevent any communications with whose contents they were unacquainted reaching the friends of the new régime in the settlement. The new governor, of course, was the especial object of their search, and every equipage about which a governor could be concealed was scrutinized by them as keenly as the cars are explored by lynx-eyed trainmen in the season when tramps are stealing free rides across the country. One of the Kildonan settlers found this out one day, somewhat to his alarm, when he tried to play a harmless joke after the elephantine manner supposed to be characteristic of us Scotchmen. It appears that the settler was bringing in from St. Cloud a Presbyterian missionary who was coming out for the first time to take part in the church work of the West, and upon their arrival at the fence they were stopped and interrogated in the customary way. The missionary being a somewhat magisterial-looking man, it occurred to the settler that the obstructionists were eyeing him with considerable suspicion, and so thinking to have some diversion he waited for the question, "Whom have you here?" "Our governor," he replied. The words were scarcely out of his mouth before there was such a "mustering in hot haste," and such a threatening display of fire-arms that the settler thought the joke had gone about far enough, and so, without much loss of time, said: "Perhaps I had better explain for fear we misunderstand each other. If you are looking for the new governor of the country I haven't got him, but this gentleman here is a governor in our church." After a little parley the settler, who was quite well known to some of the party, was allowed to pass through with the man of peace, the latter, perhaps, more thankful than ever before that he held a commission from higher authority than that of earthly potentates.

Every effort short of force was being used by the local authorities, the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and his Council, to secure a peaceable solution of the difficulties impending, but to all these the rebels turned a deaf ear, and a few days after the erection of the barricade a mounted troop of them, under command of Ambroise Lepine, rode to the place where Governor Macdougall had come upon British territory, and warned him to leave before nine o'clock next morning. They returned the following day at eight to see this programme carried out, and the Governor, having no other recourse in the presence of arms than to obey, recrossed the boundary line to Pembina, in the State of Dakota.

A striking figure was this Ambroise Lepine, as I remember seeing him in Fort Garry in the heyday of his power (and even as I saw him at the market-place in Winnipeg a few days ago, unbroken by the weight of sixty years or more) — a man of magnificent physique, standing fully six feet three and built in splendid proportion, straight as an arrow, with hair of raven blackness, large aquiline nose and eyes of piercing brilliance; a man of prodigious strength, a skilled rough-rider and, withal, a dangerous subject to meet in conflict. He had great influence amongst his compatriots, and by reason, doubtless, of his physical prowess and striking military appearance, soon obtained control of their armed movements. No excuse can be made for his complicity in some of the events that transpired later, but of all the leaders of the rebellion he was the only one who manifested anything like manliness after it was over, by refusing to stay abroad and by submitting to arrest, saying that the law could take its course with him seeing he had only done what he thought was his duty. Speaking of that arrest by anticipation, it is told that when the two men who were entrusted with the duty of executing the warrant went to his house in the night, Lepine took a look at them, and remarking that he could knock their heads together if he wished, nevertheless got ready and went unresistingly along with them.*

To revert to the barricade again, we are not surprised to find that, as winter was coming on, the rebels began to look around for more comfortable quarters, and that accordingly, on the 3rd of November, they rode down to Fort Garry, and in spite of the protest of the Hudson's Bay officer in charge, entered upon possession of it, with all its stores and abundant supplies. It is quite well known that some (amongst them certain old pensioners from regiments formerly in the country) had expressed opinion that such a movement as this would take place, and had offered to garrison the fort, but there being difference of mind upon the point, nothing was done. Riel accordingly entered without forcible opposition, and proceeded to make himself comfortable by utilizing the furniture intended for Governor Macdougall; and as the provision of the fort was ample, the rebel chief and his followers wore fine linen, the best of cloth capots, silk-worked moccasins, etc., and fared sumptuously every day.

It has been fashionable, in some quarters, to accuse the Hudson's Bay Company of conniving at this seizure and at the rebellion generally, but the utter absurdity of assertions like these is apparent to anyone who thinks upon the subject. The company had parted with their control of the country, which indeed was, in the nature of things, getting beyond their domination. They had nothing to gain and everything to lose by having the whole territory in a state of unrest, to the serious detriment of their trade, and were certainly to suffer a loss, that could not well be appraised, by having Riel and his following quartered upon them for nearly a year. Besides this, Governor McTavish, the head of the company in the country, on the 16th of November, in view of the fact that Riel had called a convention from all parts of the settlement, issued a proclamation denouncing in the strongest terms the insurrectionary movement, calling upon those engaged in it to disperse to their homes, and with all the weight of his authority asking the convention to employ, in any movement in which they might engage to secure their rights, only such means as were "lawful, constitutional, rational and safe." I remember, too, hearing my father, who visited Governor McTavish in his sick-room about this time, say that he never witnessed anything more pathetic than the way in which the Governor referred to the fact that the insurgents had hauled down the Union Jack and hoisted an ensign of their own device with fleur-de-lis and shamrock, and how he said, "As I saw, through my window, the hoisting of their rag on our old flagstaff, I almost choked with mortification and shame." Add to these things, also, the fact that Riel, in the general convention held in February, after his entry into Fort Garry, made, according to the report in his own paper, the New Nation, a most bitter attack upon the Hudson's Bay Company, saying, amongst other things, that instead of having the prefix "honorable" they should have the title "shameful,"—consider all this and the theory as to collusion between them becomes exceedingly chimerical.

One of the first acts of Riel was to issue, under duress, from the Nor'-Wester office, a circular addressed to the people of the country, asking them to a convention to consider the situation of affairs; but in regard to this and any later convention called, if we can judge from his conduct as reported in his own organ, it seems as if he wished to give the outside world the impression that all the people of the country were in sympathy with him, while at the same time he was determined to have his own way, whatever the others advised.

If it be asked how it was that the other inhabitants of the country did not rise up and put the rebellion down at that stage or later, various answers might be given in the presence of some abortive efforts made by certain well-meaning people so to do. It is quite safe to say that the white settlers, at first, never dreamed that the movement would be carried as far as it was eventually, and we are equally safe in asserting that the leaders of the movement themselves went far beyond their original intention as they became the more intoxicated with power and success. It must be borne in mind that to these settlers Canada was practically an unknown quantity, and that they looked upon the quarrel as not theirs to settle in view of the circumstances that brought it about.

In the report of Colonel Dennis, chief of the staff of surveyers, and Governor Macdougall's deputy in the new territory, the matter is put in concise and very intelligible shape. The Colonel had gone along the Red River to raise a force to escort the new Governor in, and he gives the following as the general expression of feeling: "We (the English-speaking settlers) feel confidence in the future administration of the government of this country under Canadian rule; at the same time we have not been consulted in any way as a people on entering into the Dominion. The character of the new government has been settled in Canada without our being consulted. We are prepared to accept it respectfully, obey the laws and become good subjects; but when you present to us the issue of a conflict with the French party, with whom we have hitherto lived in friendship, backed up as they would be by the Roman Catholic Church (which seems probable by the course taken by the priests), in which conflict it is almost certain the aid of the Indians would be invoked, and perhaps obtained by that party, we feel disinclined to enter upon it, and think that the Dominion should assume the responsibility of establishing amongst us what it and it alone has decided upon."

Who is there whose calm common-sense will not say that this position was a reasonable one to take? As to the references made in the statement, that concerning the part taken by the priests had ground in the fact that the blockading party at the Salle River were quartered in part at Père Richot's house, that seditious meetings had been held on Sundays almost, if not altogether, in connection with the church services, and that O'Donoghue, perhaps the deepest and most dangerous of all the rebel leaders, was studying for the priesthood in St. Boniface. The reference to the probability of Indian aid being invoked and obtained is shown to have been reasonable by the fact that such aid was invoked and obtained with terrible effect under much less favorable circumstances, and against heavier odds, by practically the same parties, some fifteen years later, in the second rebellion.

So much in explanation of the position taken by the settlers other than the French at the outset. Later on, when the temper and attitude of Riel and his followers were such as to estrange from them any sympathy they might otherwise have had, the settlement was utterly unable to make any successful move against them, however much the people may have desired so to do. The rebels held a stone-walled and bastioned fort, built for defence; they held all the military stores of the country in Enfield rifles and cannon, and, as the New Nation said in one of its February numbers, they had all the powder in the territory except a small and damaged lot at Lower Fort Garry. With all the Hudson's Bay stores in their power, a siege against the rebels would have been hopeless, even though the settlers could have left their homes in the dead of winter and camped around the fort, while to have attempted an assault with shotguns and scant ammunition would have been absurd.

As an example of the kind of arms some of the loyalist settlers were provided with, I myself saw more than one man at the rendezvous afterwards in Kildonan armed only with a bludgeon weighted with lead. We give due credit for good intention and even for valor to those who carried them, but to suggest an attack upon a fully-garrisoned fort such as we remember Fort Garry to have been at the time, with such weapons, was certainly giving small evidence of possessing that discretion which is valor's better part. And yet there were attempts made against the rebels, as we have already implied, but although the men who engaged in them doubtless meant well, it has scarcely required the after-light of twenty-five years to show that these attempts did more harm than good. They certainly led to the death of two excellent young men —the one of the older, the other of the newer settlers—and to the intense suffering of many more; to the exasperation of the whole situation, and to the creation of a race and creed cleavage from which we have not yet wholly recovered.

There had been a time when a large portion of the French population did not follow Riel in his resort to arms, though they, in common with nearly all the people of the country, felt somewhat keenly anxious as to their rights under the incoming Government. On looking up records I find that my father, then a magistrate and a member of the Council of Assiniboia (the governing body in Hudson's Bay Company days), seconded, with the Hon. A. G. B. Bannatyne as mover, the following resolution: "That Messrs. Dease and Goulet be appointed to collect as many of the more respectable of the French community as possible, and with them proceed to the camp of the party who intend to intercept Hon. Mr. Macdougall, and endeavor to procure their peaceable dispersion." That the men sent failed in their mission does not disprove the fact that they had large loyal support amongst their own people. Moreover, we find that after Riel had seized Fort Garry he was at one time on the point of consenting to the Hudson's Bay Company continuing in authority till a committee of French and English could treat with Mr. Macdougall or with the Dominion direct, when a rumor that the Canadians around were about to move on Fort Garry put an end to the matter.

HON. A. G. B. BANNATYNE.

Besides all this, there was a time, even after the rebellion had gone some length, when, through the intervention of Mr. Bannatyne, three well-known French half-breeds, Francois Nolin, Augustin Nolin, and one Perreault, agreed to have a meeting of English and French to discuss their rights and send a statement of these to

Mr. Macdougall, whom, if he granted them, they would bring into the country in spite of Riel. It is said on good authority that these men with others were actually in council on the matter when a report reached them that the Canadians, together with the English-speaking settlers, were combining to attack the French. This seemed to the friendly half-breeds to mean that the French element was to be coerced without regard to their rights, and hence, though some of the French half-breeds never joined Riel, the opposition offered by these movements against him practically solidified the great body of them in sympathy with his position, and led to serious consequences.

These movements, however, though in some cases irresponsibly organized, were doubtless entered upon with the best intention on the part of those engaged in them, and we shall give a few reminiscent sketches of them in the next chapter.

CHAPTER V.

SOME COUNTER-EFFORTS AND THEIR RESULTS.

LARGE "ifs" always stand stiffly in the way, and therefore we gain little now by saying that if the Hon. William Macdougall had returned to Ottawa, instead of remaining on the frontier, and if his deputies and agents within the new territory had been more discreet, we might have been spared some of the deplorable scenes that followed. The Governor on the frontier was an irritant to the rebels, and the agents or alleged agents within were a ferment in the midst of the elements composing the population. Both parties were doubtless actuated by the very best motives and most loyal intentions, but the retirement of the one and the silence of the other would have left the incensed and (in their own view) wronged rebels without any excuse for openly assailing the residents of the community and depriving some of their liberty and others, alas, of their lives. The Governor was ill-advised by friends in the territory, "on no account to leave Pembina," and by communication between them the unreasonable idea of some forcible effort to put down the rebellion was kept alive, with the irritating results already noticed. On the 1st day of December it was expected that the new territory would have been formally transferred to Canada, and so upon that day Governor Macdougall issued what purported to be a Queen's Proclamation appointing him as Governor of the territory, and another proclamation, signed by himself as Governor, appointing Col. Dennis his Deputy within the territory, with power to raise and equip a force wherewith to overcome the rebellious element. No one feels disposed to impugn Mr. Macdougall's good faith and good intention in taking this course, but it turned out to have been taken without due authority, and for the unwarrantable use made of the Queen's name he was severely censured by the Canadian Government.

When it was discovered that what was called the Queen's Proclamation was not so in reality, the situation became more chaotic than ever; but in the meantime Col. Dennis thought he was justified in raising an armed force to overturn the rebel power, and with the aid of others proceeded so to do. One of the first results was the gathering of some forty-five men in the house of Dr. Schultz, in the village near Fort Garry, to protect some Government supplies; but this handful was practically nothing against the rebel force in Fort Garry. Accordingly, when, a few days later, a force of some three hundred rebels, well armed and with several pieces of artillery, came towards the flimsy building, the poorly equipped little garrison did the only sensible thing under the circumstances and surrendered without resistance. They were disarmed and imprisoned in Fort Garry, some, amongst them Schultz himself, being placed in solitary confinement.

Schultz was a man his captors feared with a wholesome dread. For a number of years he had been active in the affairs of the country, especially in connection with the agitation for free trade and for closer connection with the Empire, and was known as a man very impatient of restraint and in many ways difficult to handle. Physically he was of giant stature and possessed of almost incredible strength, as some who attempted his arrest in connection with the free-trade and other squabbles in the country had found to their cost. I remember when a boy running beside him, as with powerful stride he walked from our home to the river on an occasion when I was sent to direct him to a house which he was to visit on a medical consultation, and I can yet see the oars bending like willows in his strong hands as he propelled the rough boat against the waves. I recall, too, hearing how once at a meeting in the town a riot was feared, and how Schultz, who was seated on a great home-made oaken chair, rose, and putting his foot on one of the bars, wrenched the chair asunder as if it had been made of pipe-stems, after seeing which the crowd decided that if they were going to do any rioting they would leave him unmolested at any rate. A man of that physical stamp and, withal, of somewhat inflammatory cast of mind, the rebels thought they had better keep apart and well guarded; hence they placed him alone, and, as afterwards appeared, they fully intended to put a sudden end to his career.

But they were to be baulked of their prey. Certain delicacies from friends were allowed him, and it is said that in a pudding one day a knife and a gimlet were concealed. With the knife he cut into strips the buffalo robe he slept upon and such clothing as he could spare, and having with the aid of the gimlet fastened the line thus made to the wall, he let himself out of the window on the night of the 23rd of January. His ponderous weight was too much for the slender rope, and while yet quite a distance from the ground the line broke and the escaping prisoner came to the earth with great force, injuring his leg somewhat seriously. A less determined man would have given up, as there was still the high stone wall to scale, but in some way he managed it and in due time was on the outside of the fort. The night was dark and stormy, with cold wind and whirling snow, and Schultz, somewhat dazed by the fall, missed his bearings, only realizing his whereabouts when he came on landmarks which told him he was making for St. Boniface. That was not very satisfactory, so he turned and nearly ran up against a sentry at one of the fort gates! But by this he had found his latitude and as rapidly as he could walk and run he made his way to my father's house in Kildonan, about six miles away from the place of his captivity.

I have heard it said on good authority lately (though I have no personal knowledge of the fact), that up to that time the relations subsisting between Schultz and my father were not the most cordial, perhaps because the former was bitterly opposed to the Hudson's Bay Company, while my father would not allow anything said against the Company in his presence. If any such coldness did exist between them previous to that night, the coming of Schultz for refuge to my father's house was but another instance of that shrewd, far-sighted knowledge of human nature for which he was always noted. Apart altogether from my father's well-known contempt for the alleged government of Riel, he was too much of a Highlander to close his door against even an enemy when he was wearied and hard-hunted, or else he would have been unworthy of the name that has become synonymous with hospitality, and has been immortalized by Scott in the famous meeting of Fitz-James and Roderick Dhu.

I remember well the arrival of Schultz at our house. It was in the grey dawn, and a cold morning at that, when a knocking came at the door, which my father rose and opened. I can recall his surprised exclamation, "Bless me, doctor, is this really you?" Then I can see the fugitive enter, thinly clad, tall, haggard and gaunt, and as soon as he had assured himself that there were no servants in the house who might betray him, he told the story of his escape as we have just related it. My father escorted his guest upstairs, watched over him while he slept, and all that afternoon the two remained there, conversing only in whispers so that their voices would not be heard by any who might come into the house. Again and again that day Riel's scouts, on their red-blanketed horses, passed by the door looking for their escaped prisoner, concerning whom Riel said to the Rev. George Young, "The guards are out looking for him, and they have orders to shoot him on sight."

Meanwhile my brother Alexander had gone into town and secured from his friends a pair or two of pistols, which were duly brought and handed upstairs, where a new programme was made out. Schultz was determined that he would never be taken alive, hence he decided that if the scouts entered the house he would sell his life as dearly as possible and neither give nor take quarter. For two days he remained there, and on the second night my father's favorite horse, "Barney," was hitched up, and the brother above mentioned drove the hunted man, by an unfrequented road, to the Indian settlement near Selkirk, whence, accompanied by the faithful Joseph Monkman, he made that terrible mid-winter journey on foot to eastern Canada. Afterwards we heard that some of the scouts had located him when in our house, but that either out of respect to my father, who had doubtless befriended many of them, or from dread of the desperate man they were hunting, they concluded not to enter.

In after years when I heard Sir John Schultz say that he "had still the shattered remnants of a good constitution," I used to account for the "shattering" by thinking of the desperate leap from the prison, the running with maimed limb and scanty clothing six miles in an arctic atmosphere, and then the fearful journey on foot across the rocky shores and wind-swept bays of Lake Superior to the cities of the East. Whether he and my father were warm friends before or not, they certainly were after that experience in the "City of Refuge;" and born orator as Sir John was, he never made a more graceful allusion in spoken words than he did when, at the unveiling of the Seven Oaks monument, he spoke of the man who at great personal risk opened the door of welcome to him in his extremity.

Meanwhile, the other prisoners were detained in Fort Garry, Riel was taking steps to form a provisional government, and Mr. Donald A. Smith (now Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal) had arrived from the East as a special commissioner from the Dominion Government to settle the existing difficulties. By reason of his long experience in the country and the great respect in which he was held by all classes, Mr. Smith's arrival was hailed with pleasure. Exercising rare skill and tact, he secured from Riel the calling of an assemblage of all the settlers on the 19th of January, for the purpose of hearing the commission read as to the purpose and scope of Mr. Smith's mission. About ten days before this Riel had caused to be published the slate of the so-called Provisional Government, the principal part of which consisted in the declaration of himself as President, O'Donoghue as Secretary-Treasurer, and Ambroise Lepine as Adjutant-General.

Many racy incidents are related by those who were present at the Assembly on the 19th of January to hear Mr. Smith's commission. Probably a thousand or more had gathered, so the meeting had to be held in the open air. An open-air meeting with the thermometer over twenty degrees below zero could hardly be called a deliberative assembly, as the conditions were not favorable to absorption in the subject. Mr. Smith is said to have refused to read his papers under the hybrid ensign of the rebel government, and so the Union Jack had to be displayed. Then Riel, who was becoming more and more of a "megalomaniac," wished to prevent the papers being read at all, on which a well-known settler caught the redoubtable President by the back of the collar and pulled him down the steps on which he was standing. Riel immediately threw off his coat (which in falling struck my father, to whom Riel, true to his French politeness, even in his rage, said "Pardon, monsieur"), and called out the guard. The gates were closed and things generally looked ugly, but finally quiet was restored and the papers read. At the close of the reading, on motion of Riel himself, seconded by Mr. A. G. B. Bannatyne, it was resolved that a convention consisting of twenty men from the English and twenty from the French side be called for the 25th of January to consider the whole matter of Mr. Smith's mission, and to formulate such a programme as seemed best for the country.

This meeting on the 19th January was the first direct blow given to Riel's position; or, changing the figure, it was the first real undermining of his authority, and Mr. Smith, as Commissioner from a Government which now showed every anxiety to do what was fair to all classes, scored a most decided and influential victory. One cannot help feeling now that had counter-movements against Riel (which could not possibly succeed under the circumstances) ceased, there would have been a bloodless settlement of the whole business; but the irritation caused by military movements against him, coupled with the fact that his star was on the wane, led doubtless to the horrible murder he shortly afterwards committed in the vain hope of establishing his authority beyond dispute.

The convention of forty French and English representatives met as called on the 25th of January, and continued from day to day till the 11th of February. The best existing report of that convention is found in the New Nation, Riel's organ, which is in the possession of Mr. J. P. Robertson, in the Provincial Library of Manitoba. The file, which was purchased from Mr. Wm. Coldwell, the ablest newspaper man of his time, tells an eloquent tale even in its appearance. The first page of it is called The Red River Pioneer, Vol. I., No. I.; the next page is blank, and on the following one we read, The New Nation, Vol. I., No. I. The explanation is that Mr. Coldwell was just beginning the publication of the Pioneer when Riel came down upon him, and vi et armis nipped it in the bud and established with its plant the New Nation, under control of one of his own following. Whoever reported the proceedings of the Convention of Forty for the New Nation did it well, not only as wielding a facile pen, but wielding it impartially, since several things not at all flattering to Riel are preserved. We have, too, the record of some hot passages-at-arms in which Riel was distinctly worsted.

The chairman of the convention was Judge Black, head of the law courts in the territory, a man of commanding intellect, of great forensic ability, and such noble bent of character that he had the utmost confidence of the whole community. During the convention we find he made several speeches of considerable length, in which occur passages of lofty and impassioned eloquence. Next to Judge Black, whose official position gave him prominence, the most influential and distinctively directing spirit was James Ross, a man of singular ability, deep learning and rare fluency of utterance. He was a son of Sheriff Ross, who had been famous as a leading man and an historian in the early days of the country. James Ross, who was a native of Red River, had graduated with high honors from Toronto University, had been a leading writer on the Globe there, and was an able lawyer. Despite the slanders of adventurers, he is remembered as one who had at heart the highest good of the country in which he was born. His legal accomplishments and intimate knowledge of the Canadian constitution made him a most indispensable member of the convention, and to his opinions the greatest deference was paid. Amongst the other members were several who afterwards became prominent in the history of the country, and who even then showed remarkable acquaintance with public questions.

This convention was of great importance, and hence the full list of members selected for it is here given, with the sections of the country they represented.

As there are some people even to this day who claim that Riel was loyal to British interests, though anxious about the privileges and rights of his countrymen, it may be worth while to give a few extracts from the report in his own paper: "For my part I would like to see the power of Canada limited in this country; that's what I want." "England chose to neglect us for one or two centuries back, and I do not suppose we are under any very great obligations to keep her laws." "For my part I do not want to be more British than I can help."

Amongst the incidents of the convention we notice in the report an attempt on the part of Riel to rebuke Mr. John (afterwards Senator) Sutherland, of Kildonan, who hotly replied that he had been giving his time all winter without fee or reward to efforts for the good of the country, that he was there to speak for the people who sent him, and did not propose to be taught his duty by Louis Riel. At another point three of the French half-breed representatives, Nolin, Klyne and Harrison, incurred the displeasure of Riel by voting against a motion

he had submitted suggesting that the Hudson's Bay Company be ignored in all bargains made as to the transfer of the country. Nolin replied defiantly, which so angered Riel that he made a number of unaccountable arrests during the few following days, and even started out after Nolin, whose relatives, however, were so numerous, powerful and determined that Riel desisted in time to save himself from annihilation.

In the convention every phase of the country's future was discussed, and every question from railroad construction to a standing army was canvassed. A very elaborate Bill of Rights was framed and submitted to Commissioner Smith, who replied on behalf of the Dominion Government as far as he was able within the scope of his commission, after which he invited the convention to send delegates to confer with the authorities at Ottawa. This invitation was accepted, and thus an important stage of progress was reached. One cannot study closely this portion of our country's history without feeling what a lasting debt the country owes to the courage, tact and patience of Mr. Donald A. Smith, who has been so deservedly raised to the peerage for his eminent services to the Empire.

It was not within the province of the convention, nor was it contemplated in the summons calling it, to take any steps towards confirming or approving the Provisional Government that Riel had already formed, but the opportunity was too good a one to be lost, and so he introduced the question when the other business was concluded. Most of the English delegates at once took the position that they had no instructions from their constituents on that point, and that therefore they could take no action upon it that would bind those who sent them to the convention; but Riel was anxious to have the matter pressed so that he would seem to have the approval of the country. The representatives from Kildonan, John Fraser and John Sutherland, declined to be parties to it till it seemed in the interests of present peace. They, having no time to consult their constituents, went to see Governor McTavish, and he, wearied with the protracted strife, said: "Form a government of some kind and restore peace and order in the settlement." And so with that end in view the delegates, without professing to bind their constituents, consented to the formation of a Provisional Government, whose personnel as to the chief officers was as stated above, though there was some hot feeling in the convention over continuing Riel in the presidency.

RIEL AND HIS COUNCIL, 1869-70.

CHAPTER VI.

COLLAPSE OF THE REBELLION.

WHEN the Convention of the Forty adjourned they left such organization as undertook to carry on the government of the country, and from that time President Riel and his Council became the body that alleged to have the right to make and administer law in the community. Concurrently with the adjournment of the convention nearly all the remaining prisoners were released. The question as to why the English-speaking members of the convention did not refuse to sit except on the condition that they would all be released occurs most naturally here, and the only possible reply that can be given is that they had agreed to meet with the French and discuss the political situation, and that if they had withdrawn the latter would have remained and given the business whatever turn seemed pleasing to themselves, regardless of the views and wishes of any other portion of the community. But on the close of the convention the majority of the prisoners were released, and in all probability there would have been a general gaol delivery had not some developments taken place outside. Another warlike expedition began up the Assiniboine River, in Portage la Prairie, High Bluff, Poplar Point, White Horse Plains and Headingly, and a body of men numbering seventy-five or eighty, poorly enough armed, started on the march, intending to rendezvous at Kildonan and enlist the settlers along the Red River in the movement. The occasion of this was probably the delay in releasing the balance of the prisoners, and, on the part of the leaders, a certain amount of impatience with existing conditions. On the way down several of the houses were searched for Riel, who sometimes visited them, and though certain of those engaged in the search claimed that they only intended to hold him as a hostage for the release of the remaining prisoners, others openly said they would have made an end of him.

When this was reported to Riel he was once more at white heat. Many of his men had gone to their homes, but runners were quickly sent out, and until the counter-movements ceased Fort Garry was garrisoned by between six and seven hundred well-armed men—a force so great as to render attack by their poorly armed opponents on the stone-walled, bastioned and artilleried redoubt utterly futile. Nevertheless the body of men above referred to came on to Kildonan, where the most of them bivouacked in the historic church and school. I remember well when they arrived at the school, the morning of, I think, the 14th of February. The younger fry amongst us thought the whole thing a splendid idea, on the same principle that actuated the boy who fiercely rejoiced at the burning of his school because he did not know the geography lesson.

To the older people, doubtless, the situation was much more serious, and large numbers of men, not only from Kildonan, but also from St. Paul's, St. Andrew's and St. Peter's, gathered together to discuss it. The consensus of opinion amongst them seems to have been that any movement of the kind contemplated would not only be futile, for the reasons above given, and likely to end in a useless shedding of blood, but that it was also inopportune, inasmuch as the species of union effected between the opposing parties by the convention just held would be the most certain means of preserving peace until the Dominion Government, with whom the delegates from that convention were treating, would take the whole matter in hand. In the meantime, those assembled at the rendezvous received every hospitality from the people of Kildonan, who entertained as many as they could in their homes, and provided food for those quartered in the church and school.

On the second day after the arrival of the party a very distressing incident took place in the shooting of one of the most promising young men in the parish. I remember as it were yesterday how one of the neighbor boys rushed into our house, exclaiming, "John Hugh Sutherland is shot!" and how the news fell upon us like lead. It appeared that on the night before a young French half-breed named Parisien, suspected of being one of Riel's spies, was taken prisoner by the men in the school-house, and the next day, when out with a guard, he made a dash for liberty, snatching a double-barrelled gun from one of the sleighs as he went. He ran swiftly down the river-bank, and there met young Sutherland, who was riding on horse-back toward the school. Parisien either feared that he would be intercepted, or perhaps he hoped to get the horse and so escape; but at any rate, he shot at Sutherland full in the breast. The horse swerved and the rider fell, but Parisien continued on. Looking back, he saw Sutherland rising to his feet, when, without stopping, he swung the gun over his shoulder (such was the deadly skill of these men) and discharged the second barrel, the contents entering the back of the unfortunate youth, who staggered and fell upon his face. Strong hands raised him and bore him to the hospitable manse of the Rev. John Black, near at hand, and on Sutherland's recovering consciousness and seeing the venerable face of his old minister, his first words were, "Pray for me." He lingered on into the night, and then one of the brightest lives of his time went out into the unseen with the prayer upon his lips, not for vengeance upon his murderer, but for mercy upon all. Meanwhile the horse, with empty and blood-stained saddle, had run back home to carry the tale to the parents; while the desperate spy, narrowly escaping lynching, lingered on to die from natural causes a few months afterwards. The effect of this lamentable affair was sobering in the extreme, and revealed, as by a startling providence, what might be the fate of others and what untold sorrow might come upon many homes without adequate cause and without commensurate results.

Some messages passed between Riel and the assembled force, and it seemed to be understood that the latter had liberty to return to their homes without any let or hindrance, and that the prisoners still held would be released. Accordingly, those gathered at Kildonan dispersed quietly to different parts of the parishes northward, but those from up the Assiniboine, who had begun the movement, did not fare so well. I have heard it said that Riel was angered at their exhibiting distrust of his word by making a detour to avoid passing Fort Garry, instead of going home by the usual travelled highway, but I think the story extremely improbable. It is more likely that he was enraged because some of those in the party were for the second time engaged in effort against him, and because, as referred to above, he had a lively idea of what might have befallen him had he been found by them on the way to the rendezvous. Whatever the reason may have been, the upshot was that as this handful of men were making their way to their homes across the deep snow of the prairie, they were intercepted by a large force of Riel's men, mounted and well armed. No resistance was made, as it was represented to them that Riel wished to see them at the fort, and they never dreamed of imprisonment. In any case, neither in numbers nor equipment would they have been any match for the rebels; but from personal acquaintance with many of those men, I feel sure that if they had known the indignities they were all to suffer, and if they could have seen the causeless and cruel murder of one of their number, they would have made then and there a last desperate stand against the enemy. As it was they went quietly to the fort, where to their surprise they were "thrust into the inner prison," and several of them—Boulton, Scott, Powers, McLeod, Alexander and George Parker—were specially singled out and the sentence of death by shooting suspended over their heads.

Riel was exceedingly desirous of securing the recognition of the Provisional Government by the English-speaking settlers, and took this method of forcing their hand, promising to spare the lives of these men if all the settlement would fall into line and send representatives to his "parliament." This, for the sake of peace, Special Commissioner Smith, aided by the clergy of various denominations, persuaded the people to do, and but for this it is exceedingly probable that Riel would have begun a series of murders whose end no one could foretell. Concerning Boulton (who was to do signal service in the field against his captor fifteen years later), Riel remained obdurate, and indeed decided that he should be shot on the night of the 19th of February, as having been the chief military director of the counter-movement. It has not been generally known, but the fact is that Boulton's life was finally spared at the intercession of Mr. (now Senator) and Mrs. Sutherland, of Kildonan, who had known Riel from his childhood, and who had come almost direct from the grave of their slain son to plead for the life of the condemned man. Riel was by no means without heart, and when he saw the earnestness as well as the grief of the parents, who had been so recently bereaved but who in their sorrow were thinking of others, he said, placing his hand upon the shoulder of the mother, "It is enough—he ought to die, but I will give you his life for the life of the son you have lost through these troubles."

And still the clouds had not all lifted. Riel's "parliament" met on the 26th of February, and to this, in the interests of peace, the English-speaking settlers, true to the promises they had made Commissioner Smith, sent representatives, who began forthwith to enact such legislation as the requirements of the time demanded. But there was withal a sullen feeling of unrest in the country, and a growing, even though unexpressed, discontent with the continued dominance and arbitrary methods of the so-called President, who played fast and loose with pledges and had such utterly un-British views as to the liberty of the subject. Doubtless Riel felt this atmosphere and tried a desperate remedy to change it, when on the 4th of March he caused the wanton murder of Thomas Scott, one of the prisoners.

I recall the first announcement of this tragedy made at a meeting in the Kildonan school by one who had come from Fort Garry that day—"There's been a man shot at the fort." That was all, until questioning drew from him such information as he had been able to gather; and that Riel had taken a mistaken means of impressing the settlers with his absolute authority was evidenced by the imprecations invoked upon his arrogant insolence. It is true that no means of taking steps to put an end to his lease of power were at hand, and as the best means in their judgment of keeping a madman quiet, the representatives of the settlers continued to sit in Council with the Provisional Government; but from that time the sympathy of the English-speaking people was completely estranged, and many of Riel's own class openly repudiated complicity with him in the killing of Scott.

Riel's paper, the New Nation, styled the murder of the young man a "military execution," and "regretted its necessity," which was said to be on account of Scott's alleged quarrelsome spirit which led him to insult the guard and even defy the President himself. There is no need now to canonize Scott, nor to claim that he possessed all the virtues and none of the vices of life; but so far as we can gather from those who knew him well, he was a young man of rather quiet habits, indisposed, as most men of Irish blood are, to be trodden upon, but not given to aggressive and unprovoked offending. Perhaps it was more by what we call chance than otherwise that he instead of Parker, or some of the others, was singled out for slaughter by the man who hoped through his death to strike terror into the community. It seems almost incredible now that after a mock trial, without any specified charges against the prisoner, without any opportunity for defence either in person or by counsel, against the protest and pleadings of the Rev. George Young, Commissioner Smith and others, a British subject in a British country should have been condemned to death and shot in the most brutal and bungling way at a few hours' notice.

However peacefully inclined one may be, he cannot picture the scene of the shooting and see this young man led out blindfolded to the shambles without feeling his blood move in fiercer thrills, and without adapting to the situation the sentiment of a verse written long ago in another connection :

“ Had I been there with sword in hand
And fifty Camerons by,
That day through high Dunedin's streets
Had pealed the slogan cry.

“ Not all their troops of trampling horse
Nor might of mailed men,
Not all the rebels in the South
Had borne us backward then.

“ Once more his foot on Highland heath
Had trod as free as air,
Or I, and all that I led on,
Been laid around him there.”

Certain it is, as we have said, that from that hour the majority of people, however much they felt themselves obliged to remain passive, utterly disapproved of Riel's course ; and some there were who told him to his face that for that and other reasons they would have nothing to do with him. Of this latter number was my father, as I recall from an incident that took place on the Queen's birthday, 1870. On the 20th of May, as appears from the files of the New Nation, he, with one or two others, was appointed by the Provisional Government a magistrate for the Fort Garry District. On May 24th the Queen's birthday was celebrated near Fort Garry with the usual sports, though it had been extensively reported that Riel was to seize the horses brought there for the races that he might have the best mounts for his cavalry. In the afternoon of that day I remember standing with my father on the roadside (now Main Street, Winnipeg) opposite the post-office, then kept by Mr. Bannatyne. It was quite customary in those days of limited correspondence and primitive postal facilities for the postmaster or his assistant to go out with a letter after anyone to whom it was addressed, as otherwise it might remain there uncalled for during many days. On this occasion Mr. Dan. Devlin, the assistant, seeing my father across the road, came over and handed him a large official envelope which had been recently dropped in the office. My father opened it, read the contents, and said to me, "We will go up to the fort." The envelope contained his commission from the Provisional Government as magistrate. He said little to me about it, as I was of but few years at the time; but I remember that, as we drove in through the gateway of Fort Garry, the guards were very polite to him, and one was detailed to hold his horse. My father went straight to the council-room, where Riel was found, and laid the commission down before the President.

"What is wrong with that?" asked Riel. "Isn't it properly signed and sealed? It is intended for you."

"I suppose it is properly signed," said my father, "but I do not wish to keep it. The fact is, Mr. Riel, I do not recognize your government as having any right or authority to make appointments like this. I am already a justice of the peace by the Queen's appointment through the Hudson's Bay Company, and so do not desire to keep this document, which has to me no value."

Riel seemed rather nettled, but brushed the paper aside with a "Very well, please yourself!" and then began to talk on other matters. Amongst other things, he said: "We had a Council meeting last night, and were talking about the soldiers who are coming from Canada. Poor fellows! they will have a hard time of it."

They will not reach here till the winter, and we were thinking of sending a party of men out to meet them with snowshoes." At this stage my father remarked that this would be needless trouble, as he thought they would be here sooner than some people wished. This did not seem to improve matters much, and so shortly afterwards a somewhat ceremonious good-bye was said, and we drove away, the guards with much civility turning the horse and leading him out through the gates.

The summer wore on without much excitement, the prisoners having been all released, and the settlers going on with their usual work, while all the time looking eagerly for the troops. The first detachment of these, under Col. Wolseley (now Commander-in-Chief of the British army), arrived in the district on the 24th of August, when they came up the river and camped near Kildonan on their way to the fort. Many of the settlers went down to see them, but once they got within the picket lines they stayed there, much to their surprise, all night. Col. Wolseley, so far as he knew, was in the enemy's country, and was not going to run any risks from possible spies; hence every man that came within reach was held and examined by him. Of course, the people who were satisfied as to their own loyalty and knew nothing of military rules were considerably incensed, and one of the older men of the Selkirk settlers is said to have waxed perilously near the profane as he wrathfully assured the gallant Colonel that he was just as loyal as that commander himself. Wolseley, however, remained provokingly unmoved, and so quite a number of the settlers remained in "corral" till next morning, when he moved on to Fort Garry. I remember the day as one of drenching rain, when partly by boats on the river and partly by land as mounted scouts, the soldiers proceeded to the rebel stronghold. A goodly number of the settlers followed in their wake, expecting to see a "clash at arms," but they were all doomed to disappointment on that score, for when Wolseley's men reached the fort they found that Riel, O'Donoghue, Lepine and the rest had vacated in favor of the new-comers the very comfortable quarters they had occupied for so many months.

EARLY GOVERNORS OF THE WEST.

CHAPTER VII.

THE MAKING OF A PROVINCE.

WITH the leading historical facts concerning the formative period immediately succeeding the first rebellion most of our readers will be more or less familiar, but they are only the centre of a great deal in the life that was unique and peculiar. On taking possession of Fort Garry Col. Wolseley very wisely refrained from assuming a military dictatorship, but called upon Mr. Donald A. Smith to act as the administrator of Government until the arrival and installation of the Hon. Adams G. Archibald, the first actual governor of the country under Canadian rule. The interregnum was not altogether devoid of excitement, nor were indeed many of the succeeding days commonplace or monotonously quiet.

For the maintenance of law and order a mounted police force was organized under command of Capt. Villiers, of the Quebec Rifles, and as this was the first regular police force in the West, and as some of the members in after years became prominent and wealthy men, we give the list in full: W. F. Alloway, James Cross, William Montgomery, Timothy Carroll, Edwin Doidge, Elijah Ketts, George Kerr, John Melanson, John Stevenson, Leon Hivet, George Nicol, H. Montgomery, Robert Power, Maxime Villebrun, W. Miller, John Paterson, Andrew Persy, Neil McCarthy, Michael Fox. These policemen had no sinecure, as may easily be imagined when the condition of things is considered.

The soldiers, released from the struggle of the half-military, half-voyageur life they had led for the past few months, were more or less disposed to take advantage of any opportunities that offered themselves for the somewhat fast and furious pace allowed by the codeless life of a frontier, and as they looked with some bitterness upon the half-breed population, as on those whose compatriots had imprisoned many and murdered one of their countrymen, conflicts more or less sharp were not infrequent on the streets of the straggling village. In one case a French half-breed, who had hot words with some of them in a saloon, was chased by an excited crowd to the river, and was there drowned in efforts to escape from them, though it was not likely they would have done him any serious injury. On another occasion a huge drummer had a pitched battle on the street with a French half-breed of colossal size and strength, who, however, having never been trained in the "manly art," succumbed to the superior skill of the new-comer.

One of the results of this latter encounter was that the aforesaid drummer established a notoriety as a fighter, thereby coming into demand for the stormy political meetings of that primitive time, and more than once have I seen him alert and ready to ply his pugilism at the signal of his political leader. Meetings of the kind indicated were not infrequent, as nearly every aspirant for political leadership was accompanied on his stumping tours by a "bully" with such help as he could gather, and I remember once seeing a meeting pass off peaceably, owing to the presence of the big drummer on the one side and an equally redoubtable champion on the other, each fearing to provoke active hostilities.

The beginnings of political life were crude enough. Governor Archibald simply chose a small "Cabinet" somewhat representative of the English and French elements in the community, then a census of the new province was rapidly taken, a distribution into constituencies was made, and the first election to the Local Legislature held. The Province was named Manitoba after the lake bearing that name, the word being derived from two Indian words, meaning together "the straits or narrows of the Great Spirit," and though usage has placed the accent on the third syllable, it should properly be pronounced with the accent on the last.

As "first things" are always of interest in later days, it might be well to say that the census in 1870 showed a population of 11,963 in the new province—of whom 1,565 were whites, 578 Indians, 5,757 French half-breeds, and 4,083 English half-breeds. There were 6,247 Catholics, 5,716 Protestants, and the nationalities of the whites were as follows: 747 born in the North-West, 294 in eastern Canada, 69 in the United States, 125 in England, 240 in Scotland, 47 in Ireland, 15 in France, and 28 in other countries. The first local election was held on the 30th December, 1870, and the following is a list of the members elected to the first Legislative Assembly of the Province of Manitoba, with the constituencies they represented:

The first regularly constituted Government consisted of the following members :

Hon. Henry J. Clarke, Q.C., Attorney-General.

Hon. Marc Amable Girard, Treasurer.

Hon. Thomas Howard, Secretary.

Hon. Alfred Boyd, Public Works and Agriculture.

Hon. James McKay, without portfolio.

It was some years before party politics could be developed, and hence, during the meetings above referred to, the questions discussed were of a very local character, and in the end the candidate who had the largest family connection in the neighborhood was generally elected. For some time rebellion echoes were heard at all the meetings, like the war issues in United States politics, and in the English-speaking constituencies any suspected complicity in the misdeeds of the past and any heresy as to the amnesty of the rebel leaders would contribute powerfully to the overthrow of the suspected party. These meetings were not without their humorous side, and oftentimes somewhat peculiar situations arose out of the unfamiliarity of the settlers with the methods and expressions of parliamentary debate. I recollect once when a school-teacher had framed a motion and made a speech as to the leniency with which we should view those who, as mere dupes, had been drawn into the rebellion, that the reporter gave out that he had made a motion as to the brutes who had gone into the rebellion. The chagrin of the school-teacher may be imagined. I also recall seeing a man who had occupied the chair during a meeting leaving it in high dudgeon on a motion to vacate, which he was not aware was made preparatory to moving him a vote of thanks. On another occasion one embryo statesman, who was holding before his audience the hope of some change in governmental methods, and who sought to clinch his speech by the use of a proverb, got the two sayings, "Every dog has his day" and "It's a long lane that has no turning" slightly mixed, and vehemently assured the people that "It was a long dog that had no turning."

The voting was all done openly, and hence it was not surprising that in the older settled districts an election threw apples of discord into regions where formerly the inhabitants had lived in peace and quietness, while the ties which frequently occurred during the polling-day sent the pulse of the community up to fever pitch. Canvassing was of the most personal kind, and as we then had no legislation in regard to corrupt practices to reveal the sin, it was considered a sign of meanness on the part of a candidate not to provide a somewhat elaborate meal at every committee meeting, and ample refreshments in some house near the polling-place on election day. Riots were not altogether unknown and at the first election in Winnipeg wagon-spokes were freely used, the Chief of Police was rendered hors de combat, a printing office was wrecked, and finally the military had to be called out to overawe the noisy multitude.

When the first legislature met, it could not reasonably be expected that the same dignity and decorum, the same acquaintance with parliamentary methods or the same breadth of statesmanship would be manifested as in older lands. The appearance of the early House was peculiar and characteristic of a transition stage. I recall seeing in the old legislative chamber men clothed in the faultless Prince Albert black beside men in a curious compound of the old and the new, having the long curled hair of raven hue, wearing the moccasins to which they had always been accustomed and which certainly had the advantage of silence over creaky boots; coats open, displaying the colored flannel shirt without a collar, and across the waist, picturesquely slashed, the French belt or sash commonly worn on the prairies. The literary education of some of these men had been of the scantiest, and when one day a member sent a note across the floor asking a member of the Government to move the House into a "committee of the hole," it was taken jocularly as a deep-laid plot to entrap the Executive unawares. In a case under my own observation a newly-elected member, whose sudden elevation had induced the too free use of stimulants, was making himself so obnoxious that he had to be sharply called to order by the Speaker with threats of expulsion from the precincts. The member, unabashed, told the Speaker, in effect, that he ought to remember the primitive condition of things in the country; and desiring to impress the Speaker with the fact that though he (the member) was not a finished statesman, he was fairly representative of, if not superior to, his constituents in attainments, said: "You may think I am a fool, Mr. Speaker, but I am not such a fool as the people who sent me here;" in which saying the member builded better than he knew, and aptly described what has been witnessed frequently enough in political life.

That early House, too, had, in the person of a member of great avoirdupois, an inveterate joker, who, being something of an artist, used to sketch his fellow-members in their various attitudes and confront them with the pictures that they might see themselves as others saw them. Notwithstanding these peculiarities much solid work was done and many a thrilling speech made. The foundations were laid in much good legislation, and special attention was given to the religious, educational and benevolent projects of the time. Back there the enactments that gave rise to the famous School Question were passed, though it is no secret now that the House had no intention of committing the young province to the dual system of schools abolished by the famous statutes of 1890. Proceedings were conducted in the Legislature, the courts, etc., in both English and French for many years, and one of the most impassioned and eloquent speeches of the time was made by a Frenchman on behalf of retaining his mother tongue in public and official use; albeit that same speech was made in English, and the absurdity of wasting time and money in using two languages in a British country, where all who took an intelligent interest in affairs spoke English, soon became apparent. Moreover, it was found that while the appropriation was duly made, there were cases in which the French printing of the proceedings was not done for years after the sessions of the House. There was, too, a somewhat ridiculous side to the matter. Speeches from the throne were always read in both languages. Some of the governors could read in both; others, who only read English, had the good sense to hand the speech for reading to the French clerk; but when English-speaking governors, for fear of shattering the Constitution, persisted in reading the French speech with English pronunciation, the effect was so distressing that the French themselves were doubtless glad when their beautiful language could no longer be mangled so heartlessly before the public.

Changes other than the abolition of the dual language system were also made at an early date. "Dualities" have had a hard time in the West, for shortly after the beginning of our history dual representation in local and Dominion Houses had to succumb. Next in order the "Upper House" was forced to go.

The Legislative Council (as our "Upper House" was called) had come into existence on the 10th March, 1871, and was composed of the following gentlemen appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council: Hons. Donald Gunn, Francois Dauphinais, Solomon Hamelin, Colin Inkster, Dr. J. H. O'Donnell, Francis Ogletree and James McKay, the latter being Speaker of the House. This institution, intended, I suppose, as "a check on hasty legislation," was not easily annihilated, for the members in full enjoyment of its titles and emoluments were not likely to approve any bill for their own decapitation; but after some new appointments the body finally lapsed out of existence by the casting vote of the Speaker. It was only by degrees that the party element came into western politics. The natives of the country had no hereditary tendencies in that direction, but gradually the presence of Federal differences began to be felt in local circles, and under that pressure men were soon found arrayed in opposing lines of battle. Amongst the politicians of the early years were many who had won their spurs in the older provinces, and whose names will be in memory there; but of those indigenous to the soil of Manitoba were several who took a prominent part in shaping the destinies of their native land, and around these more especially interest for our present purpose centres.

In this number by far the most prominent and powerful figure was that of John Norquay, a man who made his influence felt far beyond provincial bounds. He was what was called a Scotch half-breed, uniting in himself the strain of the Orkneys with a mixture of Indian blood which he was always proud to own. He was educated wholly at the Anglican school and college at St. John's, through the benevolence of the Church, became a school-teacher in early life, and at the first local election became a member of the Local Legislature, and so remained till his death in 1891. For some seventeen years he was a member of the Government, and during nearly all that time he was First Minister of his native province. Physically, he was a man of tremendous size and strength, standing some six feet three in height, and broad and strong in proportion. As an indication of his physique, I recall seeing him at a political meeting, when a fight was imminent, thrust himself between the combatants, who found themselves as much apart as if a rock had dropped between them. He must have been a diligent student to secure the complete mastery of English he manifested in his public addresses, as well as the thorough acquaintance with public questions that gave his speeches authority. As a speaker he was at his best. He had a voice of clear and resonant force, and a fluency which carried everything before it without degenerating into wordiness, while his vocabulary was that of one who had gained it by wide reading and keen study. I heard him speak on almost every kind of theme, on a great variety of platforms, and never knew him to disappoint the expectations of his listeners. Wherever he spoke in the native parishes he would naturally have a specially sympathetic audience; but as an example of his influence on other audiences, I remember hearing him speak with great effect in an immense hall in St. Paul, Minnesota, on the occasion of a concert given there during an ice carnival by the St. George's Snowshoe Club, of Winnipeg. He was on his way home from Ottawa to Winnipeg when we secured him at St. Paul, knowing that his presence would redeem our concert from possible failure. The gathering of several thousands was representative of many parts of the United States, that nation of public speakers, and they looked with somewhat critical gaze upon our burly Premier when he was introduced as an extra on the programme. He had no special text given him, but dwelt chiefly upon the friendly relations and close connection which had always subsisted between the Red River colonists and the cities of the western States, whence he passed to the wider questions of international fellowship, evoking rounds of applause by the rolling periods of his eloquence.

In his home life, John Norquay was a lovable man, and I have more than once seen him lay aside the cares of state and play like a school-boy with his children, who clambered delightedly upon his stalwart person. His tenure of political power closed in 1889, when, weakened from without by conflicts with the Federal authorities on questions of provincial rights as to railway advantages and other matters, and from within by the overcrowding of government departments by men to whom he was too good-natured to say "no," he resigned the premiership into the charge of Dr. Harrison, who shortly afterwards met defeat at the hands of the Greenway-Martin forces. At the next session, Mr. Norquay returned to the House as leader of a "corporal's guard" in Opposition. His speech in self-defence, as he stood almost alone like a wounded stag at bay, remains as the one passage of genuine and lofty eloquence that has echoed in the halls of our Legislature. In that speech he reviewed his long tenure of office, without claiming infallibility, but showing how, with abundant opportunity for enriching himself, he had surrendered in comparative poverty the seals of office, and declaring how he was satisfied in being able to hand down an unsullied name to his children. During the delivery of his speech a member thoughtlessly taunted him with his Indian blood, and few will forget the thrillingly dramatic effect of Mr. Norquay's action as he threw up his hand to reveal the dark skin of which he said he was proud, and how he sent back with stunning force a rebuke for the unhappy sneer.

Not many months after that Mr. Norquay died of a sudden inflammation. The recollection is yet vivid of how the news sped to the startled hearts of the people, and of the way in which, regardless of party, they united in mourning for one who had done signal service to the Province in which he was born. The Greenway Government gave him a state funeral, and friends all over Canada contributed to the erection of the handsome monument which stands over his dust in the old graveyard at St. John's. No claim is made by anyone that he was a faultless man, nor even that he could have taken the highest place in the highest sphere, but considering his opportunities and the lateness of the hour in his life when he came, without any experience whatsoever, into the new career of politics, John Norquay's name stands as that of one of the most remarkable men we have yet seen in Canada.

Beside Mr. Norquay for some years in public life stood another of the native-born, the Hon. A. M. Sutherland, a brother of the young man who was shot by one of Riel's spies during the first rebellion, as already recorded. One of my first recollections of Sutherland goes back to a day at the Kildonan school in 1870, when a boy came over to the icy play-ground and said, "Aleck Sutherland has come to attend school." When the bell rang and the school assembled we saw, with the admiring gaze of small boys, a powerfully built, broad-shouldered, athletic and handsome man, who had come back to school after years of absence with the view of receiving higher education and going on to the legal profession. And so in that school, in Manitoba College and in Toronto University he pursued his studies to graduation, and in due time was admitted to the practice of law in Winnipeg. During his law studies he ran for the Local Legislature in Kildonan, his birth-place, was elected and re-elected, holding the seat till his death in 1884, and in the meantime occupying the posts of Attorney-General and Provincial Secretary with marked success. His most outstanding characteristic was a manly straightforwardness which made him a universal favorite, a fair, if forcible opponent, and a factor in a political contest that no one could ignore. His untimely death cut short what would doubtless have been a notable career, and the letters from all quarters that poured in upon his sorrowing parents, to the size of a small volume, were an index of the esteem in which he was held far and wide.

At the time of the death of Mr. Sutherland, John MacBeth, an almost inseparable personal friend, held the position of Clerk of the Executive Council, which he unselfishly resigned at the call of his leader, Mr. Norquay, to contest the constituency of Kildonan, he being also a native of that parish. He was elected for the unexpired term, and returned again at the following election, holding the seat till a redistribution took place, when he, with equal loyalty and unselfishness, retired in favor of Mr.

Norquay, who contested the new division. His warmth of heart completely disarmed the personal enmity of his bitterest political opponents, so that when the news of his death, which took place in October, 1897, reached Manitoba, there were found amongst his most sincere mourners many to whom he had stood diametrically opposed on many a hotly contested political battlefield.

In the history of every country there are found the names of some who have apparently taken but a small part in public affairs, and are soon forgotten in the rush of events, but who, nevertheless, formed an important link in the chain of the country's progress; and as I look back over the death-roll of Manitoba, the somewhat obscure name of F. H. Francis appears as one occupying this unique place. Mr. Francis was an Englishman by birth, an educated and cultured man, and a fluent speaker as far as delicate health permitted. When Mr. Norquay resigned the premiership in favor of his colleague, Dr. Harrison, the latter took into his Cabinet as representative of the French element, Mr. Burk, a merchant at St. Charles, who offered himself for re-election in the constituency of St. Francois Xavier. To oppose him with all the Government prestige and patronage at his back seemed a forlorn hope, but the then Opposition persuaded Mr. Francis to make the effort. It was in Mr. Francis' favor that he was equally at home in speaking English or French, and that as a merchant within the constituency he personally knew nearly all the electors. It is almost certain that he was the only man at that time who could gain sufficient support from the different elements to defeat Mr. Burk, as he did, to the great surprise of the Government.

By that defeat the Harrison Government was overturned, and the Greenway administration took office. Soon after this the famous school question, which changed the political face of all Canada, came into being. I have had many conversations with people who took part in that election, but there seems to be a great divergence of opinion as to what actually took place in regard to this special matter. It appears certain that for some reason or other the Harrison party assured the electors that if the Greenway party succeeded the French Roman Catholic Separate Schools would be abolished, and as to what the Greenway party said in reply there is remarkable lack of unanimity. What really took place during the election is matter of controversy, but not many days elapsed thereafter before Mr. Joseph Martin, the Attorney-General in the new administration, announced the intention of the Government to abolish Separate Schools and inaugurate a national system, which was accordingly done by the now famous Act of 1890. The St. Francois Xavier election, which was won by Mr. Francis, was the pivotal point in the whole matter.

Another of Mr. Francis's achievements was the building of the Deaf and Dumb Institute, now one of the best equipped institutions in the Province. At an early stage in the session he secured a commission to take a census of the deaf and dumb in the Province, and thereafter, even at his own expense, secured rooms and a teacher, but lived to see this work for the unfortunate on which he had set his heart an accomplished and successful fact. And so with only a few months of political life, for which he had no special love, Mr. Francis was able to bring about changes with results of extraordinarily far-reaching character. Other names of those who took part in the formative period of our history readily occur, but of these I have little personal reminiscence, while any detailed sketches of our living statesmen on both sides of politics are omitted for obvious reasons.

Amongst the Dominion statesmen who have gone from us the name of the late Sir John Schultz survives with the foremost by reason of his commanding ability and his close connection with the most stirring events of our history. What we have already written in regard to him will give some idea of his striking appearance, his loyalty, his indomitable will and courage. But we would be giving an imperfect portrait of him did we not cause him to stand out in the memory of the country he loved as a man of culture and refinement as well as of courage and strength. As a public speaker he excelled by reason of his perfect coolness, his musical, well-modulated voice, his choice language and clear-headed statesmanship. As a member of the House of Commons he exerted great influence on all legislation affecting this country, and did much to direct the attention of Canada to the great domain now being opened up in the far North-West. The knighthood conferred upon him was a fitting recognition of the perils and sufferings he had undergone in the country's service, to the complete ruin of a once splendid constitution. While Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba he did signal service in the way of inculcating lessons of patriotism amongst the school children of the Province, as well as by throwing the full weight of his influence on the side of temperance and other moral reforms. In private life he was courtly and graceful, considerate of the comfort and feelings of those he met, and from an abundant store of information always a ready and interesting conversationalist. From intimate intercourse with him in the closing years of his life I was given to feel that he was realizing to the full the earnestness of life with all its opportunities, and the solemnity of being called upon to exert an influence on one's day and generation.

Back somewhat farther in the history of the West we find the name of the late Hon. James McKay, of Silver Heights, as one who, in the interests of Canada, wielded a marked influence on the country when it was passing from the old to the new. He was what we call a Scotch half-breed, his father a Scotchman who had taken a share in one of the Sir John Franklin expeditions, and his mother having the blood of the French and the Cree in her veins. As I remember James McKay, in the last decade of his life, he was a man of immense size and weight, but his width of shoulder and general strength were so extraordinary that he seemed to carry himself lightly enough. From early custom on the plains he always wore moccasins, and I have seen somewhere a note by a traveller who met him in the corridor of a hotel, and who could not help contrasting the soft footfall of the magnificently massive man with the noisy step of some fussy little body who passed with creaking boots at the same time. McKay was a member of some of the early Cabinets, and afterwards Speaker of the Legislative Council in Manitoba, but his contribution to the national history was not made so much in legislative halls as out on his native prairies in connection with the treaties arranged between the Government and the Indians all over the West. He knew the Indians and they knew him, hence he became a medium of communication, ensuring the conclusion of treaties wise, humane and lasting. The Dominion will never wholly realize how much of the comparative peace she has enjoyed on the vast plains of the West she owes to the statesmanship of Governors Morris and Laird, aided by such men as James McKay, the Revs. John McKay, George McDougall, Father Lacombe, and others whom the Indians loved and trusted. The last time I recall seeing James McKay was during Lord Dufferin's visit to this country in 1877, when in Deer Park, near his own place, McKay was master of ceremonies in a reception to the Governor-General which took the form of a wild-west entertainment. McKay had a buffalo herd there, with broncho-breakers from the frontier, and as the massive man drove his famous cream horse here and there to regulate matters, the Governor-General perhaps realized the peculiar value of having such men to stand between the old life and the new—a fact to which he made reference afterwards in many a public address. Through the action of a limited number of them, many people think of the name "half-breed" only in connection with western rebellions, whereas the real history shows that the presence of men with Indian blood in their veins has been a most important factor in the peaceful making of the West into a part of Canada.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONTACT WITH THE OUTSIDE WORLD.

FROM the earliest times the question of communication with the outside world had been a burning problem. The first settlers, who had begun their isolation by failing to hear of Waterloo for long months after that famous battle took place, had become more or less reconciled to living "far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife." These pioneers grew content with the bi-annual trip to York Factory for merchandise and mail, and with the commerce and communication that percolated through the western States. They were not quite so solitary as the Hudson's Bay Company's officer at a remote point, who received his copies of the London Times once a year with the annual packet, and who began always at the farthest back number and read right through to get abreast of events, though even then he left off about a year behind. But while the condition of the first settlers was, soon after their arrival, a little better than his, it was not wholly satisfactory to the growing colony on the Red River, and especially was it unsatisfactory to those who in the sixties began to come more rapidly into the settlement. Hence, as soon as the rebellion had quieted down, people began to look around for inlets for population and merchandise and outlets for produce. The old steamboat, flat-bottomed and stern-wheeled, was one of the prized institutions of the time. It ran from near the "head waters" in the western States down the Red River to Fort Garry, and on rare occasions down past the lower settlement to Lower Fort Garry. These latter occasions were red-letter days for the community: schools were dismissed while the boat was passing, and grown-up people gathered on the banks, greeting her with shotgun salutes, and eliciting responses from the boat whistle, to the half-terror, half-delight of the children. When merchants began to open stores in some numbers on the present site of Winnipeg, the advent of "the first boat" after the long winter was the goal to which the hopes and the longings of people most turned. The merchant of to-day who has "just sold out," but assures the customer that he has some of the desired goods

"on the way," is distinctly of the same genus as the ancient and veracious merchants of Winnipeg, who invariably asserted concerning everything that they did not have on hand, that "it would be in on the first boat." Some mathematical genius, who perhaps desired to keep his mind engaged in arithmetical gymnastics during the long winter, made much inquiry for goods, keeping note of the stereotyped reply, and towards spring gave in miles what he considered the dimensions of "the first boat" would be if the promises of the merchants had any tangible foundation.

One of the first indications we had of swifter communication with the outside world was the erection of telegraph poles and lines across our farms in the early seventies. The proceedings were more or less shrouded with that mystery and occultness which provokes the inquiry of boys; and like the man who, seeing the electric light for the first time, wondered "how they could get such light from a hairpin in a bottle," we used to wonder how men sent messages on those wires twisted round a "bottle" at intervals. We tried to examine as far as possible, and although warned as to the danger of meddling with the strange machinery, some boy of sure eye and hand would knock one of the "bottles" off occasionally; but it refused to yield up the secret of telegraphy, and replacing it, we would take our seats upon the fence and watch whether any of the daring birds that took their places on the wires would be "shot" by the passing telegrams.

LORD DUFFERIN.

By degrees railroads pushed their way westward through the States to the boundary line, and the Pembina branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway was built to connect with Winnipeg in 1878. The first spikes in this road were driven in September, 1877, by the Governor-General and the Countess of Dufferin, whose visit in that year to the North-West marks a new era in the history of the country. They came by way of Toronto, Chicago and St. Paul, taking the last stage of the journey from Fisher's Landing to Fort Garry on the steamer Minnesota. They were received with unbounded enthusiasm in the new West, and there, as elsewhere, the tactful Governor-General did much to oil the machinery of Confederation and remove particles likely to cause friction. They had many unique experiences during their tour and their camping out, amongst them being shooting the Grand Rapids above Lake Winnipeg in a York boat, and riding in a Red River cart drawn by thirty garlanded oxen at Stony Mountain. The speech given by Lord Dufferin at a dinner in Winnipeg, before returning east, has always been regarded as one of the best immigration agencies the West has had, and we give a portion of it as bearing on the subject in hand. On rising Lord Dufferin said :

" Mr. Mayor, Your Honor, Ladies and Gentlemen :

" In rising to express my acknowledgments to the citizens of Winnipeg for thus crowning the friendly reception I have received throughout the length and breadth of Manitoba by so noble an entertainment, I am painfully impressed by the consideration of the many respects in which my thanks are due to you and to so many other persons in the Province. From our first landing on your quays until the present moment, my progress through the country has been one continual delight, nor has the slightest hitch or incongruous incident marred the satisfaction of my visit. I have to thank you for the hospitalities I have enjoyed at the hands of your individual citizens, as well as of individual communities—for the tasteful and ingenious decorations which adorned my route—for the quarter of a mile of evenly-yoked oxen that drew our triumphal car—for the universal proofs of your loyalty to the throne and to the Mother Country, and for your personal good-will to Her Majesty's representative. Above all, I have to thank you for the evidences produced on either hand along our march of your prosperous condition, of your perfect contentment, of your confidence in your future homes; for I need not tell you that to anyone in my situation, smiling cornfields, cosy homesteads, the joyful faces of prosperous men and women, and the laughter of healthy children are the best of all triumphal adornments.

“But there are other things for which I ought to be obliged to you; and first, for the beautiful weather you have taken the precaution to provide us with during some six weeks of perpetual camping out, for which attention I have received Lady Dufferin's especial orders to render you her personal thanks—an attention which the phenomenon of a casual waterspout enabled us only the better to appreciate; and lastly, though certainly not least, for not having generated amongst you that fearful entity, 'a Pacific Railway question'—at all events not in those dire and tragic proportions in which I have encountered it elsewhere. Of course, I know a certain phase of the railway question is agitating even this community, but it has assumed the mild character of a domestic rather than an inter-provincial controversy. Two distinguished members, moreover, of my government have been lately amongst you, and have doubtless acquainted themselves with your views and wishes. It is not necessary, therefore, that I should mar the hilarious character of the present festival by any untimely allusions to so grave a matter.

"Well, then, ladies and gentlemen, what am I to say and do to you in return for all the pleasure and satisfaction I have received at your hands? I fear there is very little that I can say, and scarcely anything that I can do commensurate with my obligations. Stay! There is one thing, I think, I have already done for which I am entitled to claim your thanks. You are doubtless aware that a great political controversy has for some time raged between the two great parties of the State as to which of them is responsible for the visitation of that terror of two continents—the Colorado bug. The one side is disposed to assert that if their opponents had never acceded to power the Colorado bug would never have come to Canada. I have reason to believe, however, though I know not whether any substantial evidence has been adduced in support of this assertion, that my government deny and repudiate having any sort of concert or understanding with that irresponsible invader. It would be highly unconstitutional if I, who am bound to hold an impartial balance between the contending parties of the State, were to pronounce an opinion upon this momentous question. But, however disputable a point may be the prime and original authorship of the Colorado bug, there is one fact no one will question, namely, that to the presence of the Governor-General in Manitoba is to be attributed the sudden, total, otherwise unaccountable, and, I trust, permanent disappearance, not only from this province, but from the whole North-West, of the infamous and unmentionable 'hopper,' whose visitations in the past have proved so distressing to the agricultural interests of the entire region.

"But apart from being the fortunate instrument of conferring this benefit upon you, I fear the only further return in my power is to assure you of my great sympathy with you in your endeavors to do justice to the material advantages with which your Province has been so richly endowed by the hand of Providence. From its geographical position and its peculiar characteristics, Manitoba may be regarded as the keystone of that mighty arch of sister provinces which spans the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It was here that Canada, emerging from her woods and forests, first gazed upon her rolling prairies and unexplored North-West, and learned, as by an unexpected revelation, that her historical territories of the Canadas, her eastern seaboard of New Brunswick, Labrador and Nova Scotia, her Laurentian lakes and valleys, lowlands and pastures, though themselves more extensive than half a dozen European kingdoms, were but the vestibules and ante-chambers to that till then undreamed-of Dominion, whose illimitable dimensions confound the arithmetic of the surveyors and the verification of the explorer. It was hence that, counting her past achievements as but the preface and prelude to her future exertions and expanding destinies, she took a new departure, received the afflatus of a more important inspiration, and felt herself no longer a mere settler along the banks of a single river, but the owner of half a continent, and in the magnitude of her possession, in the wealth of her resources, in the sinews of her material might, the peer of any power on earth. In a recent remarkably witty speech the Marquis of Salisbury alluded to the geographical misconceptions often engendered by the smallness of the maps upon which the figure of the world is depicted. To this cause is probably to be attributed the inadequate opinion of well-educated persons of the extent of Her Majesty's North American possessions. Perhaps the best way of correcting such a universal misapprehension would be by a summary of the rivers which flow through them, for we know that as a poor man cannot afford to live in a big house, so a small country cannot support a big river. Now, to an Englishman or a Frenchman, the Severn or the Thames, the Seine or the Rhone would appear considerable streams, but in the Ottawa, a mere affluent of the St. Lawrence—an affluent, moreover, which reaches the parent stream six hundred miles from its mouth—we have a river nearly five hundred and fifty miles long, and three or four times as big as any of them. But even after having ascended the St. Lawrence itself to Lake Ontario, and pursued it across lakes Erie, St. Clair, Huron and Superior to Thunder Bay, a distance of one thousand five hundred miles, where are we? In the estimation of the person who has made the journey, at the end of all things; but to us, who know better, scarcely at the commencement of the great fluvial system of the Dominion, for from that spot, that is to say, from Thunder Bay, we are at once able to ship our astonished traveller on to the Kaministiquia, a river some hundred miles long. Thence, almost in a straight line, we launch him upon Lake Shebandowan and Rainy Lake and River, a magnificent stream three hundred yards broad and a couple of hundred miles long, down whose tranquil bosom he floats into the Lake of the Woods, where he finds himself on a sheet of water which, though diminutive as compared with the inland seas he has left behind him, will probably be found sufficiently extensive to make him fearfully sea-sick during his passage across it. For the last eighty miles, however, he will be consoled by sailing through a succession of land-locked channels, the beauty of whose scenery, while it resembles, certainly excels the far-famed Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence. From this lacustrine paradise of sylvan beauty we are able at once to transfer our friend to the Winnipeg, a river whose existence in the very heart and centre of the continent is in itself one of nature's most delightful miracles, so beautiful and varied are its rocky banks, its tufted islands; so broad, so deep, so fervid is the volume of its waters, the extent of their lake-like expansions, and the tremendous power of their rapids. At last, let us suppose we have landed our protégé at the town of Winnipeg, the half-way house of the continent, the capital of the Prairie Province, and, I trust, the future 'umbilicus' of the Dominion. Having now had so much of water, having now reached the home of the buffalo, like Falstaff he naturally 'babbles of green fields' and careers in imagination over the primeval grasses of the prairie. Not at all. Escorted by Mr. Mayor and the Town Council we take him down to your quay, and ask him which he will ascend first, the Red River or the Assiniboine—two streams, the one five hundred miles long, the other four hundred and eighty, which so happily mingle their waters within your city limits. After having given him a preliminary canter on these respective rivers, we take him off to Lake Winnipeg, an inland sea three hundred miles long and upwards of sixty broad, during the navigation of which for many a weary hour he will find himself out of sight of land, and probably a good deal more indisposed than ever he was on the Lake of the Woods or even the Atlantic. At the north-west angle of Lake Winnipeg he hits upon the mouth of the Saskatchewan, the gateway to the North-West, and the starting point to another one thousand five hundred miles of navigable water flowing nearly due east and west between its alluvial banks. Having now reached the Rocky Mountains, our 'ancient mariner,' for by this time he will be quite entitled to such an appellation, knowing that water cannot run up hill, feels certain his aquatic experiences are concluded. He was never more mistaken. We immediately launch him upon the Athabasca and Mackenzie rivers, and start him on a longer trip than he has yet ever taken, the navigation of the Mackenzie River alone exceeding two thousand five hundred miles. If he survives this last experience, we wind up his peregrinations by a concluding voyage down the Fraser River, or, if he prefers it, the Thompson River, to the coast; whence, having provided him with a first-class ticket for that purpose, he will probably prefer getting home by the Canadian Pacific.

"Now, in this enumeration, those who are acquainted with the country know that, for the sake of brevity, I have omitted thousands of miles of other lakes and rivers which water various regions of the North-West, the Qu'Appelle River, Belly River, Lake Manitoba, the Winnipegosis, Shoal Lake, etc., along which I might have dragged, and finally exterminated, our way-worn guest. But the sketch I have given is more than sufficient for my purpose; and when it is further remembered that the most of these streams flow for their entire length through alluvial plains of the richest description, where year after year wheat can be raised without manure, or any sensible diminution in its yield, and where the soil everywhere presents the appearance of a highly cultivated suburban kitchen-garden in England, enough has been said to display the agricultural richness of the territories I have referred to, and the capabilities they possess of affording happy and prosperous homes to millions of the human race."

After referring to the many different nationalities composing the population of the West, to the problems yet to arise, and dwelling eloquently upon the future destiny of the Dominion, Lord Dufferin closed a great speech by expressing the hope that the finances of the country would soon provide for the West a railway to carry out the surplus produce, "which," said he, "my own eyes have seen imprisoned in your storehouses for want of the means of transport." The Governor General's hope in this regard soon found fruition.

This was the decade when efforts were made to construct a transcontinental line through

Canadian territory by utilizing "the magnificent water stretches," of which the Governor-General had spoken so eloquently, and hence eastward from Winnipeg beginnings were made somewhat to the bewilderment of the old settlers, through whose growing crops the roadway of the iron horse was relentlessly pushed. The Federal Government of the day felt inclined to cross the Red River about twenty-two miles north of Winnipeg, where the picturesque town of Selkirk now stands at the head of Lake Winnipeg navigation, but to that course it was objected that crossing at Selkirk would ignore the growing centre at Winnipeg, would miss the fertile plains just west of that city, as well as necessitate the great expense of construction over certain districts north-west of Selkirk, where morasses alleged to be bottomless existed. However that might be, the fact is that Winnipeg eventually drew the main line of the great railway through her borders. Not many of us have found common ground on all points with Mr. Debs, but most of us will agree with him in preferring Government ownership of railroads to railroad ownership of Governments; and yet in the light of the history of the time we know that it was not till the Canadian Pacific Railway had passed out of the immediate control of the Government into the hands of a company that its construction and operation became a success. That may be to the discredit of the Government and to the credit of the company, as the case may be, but I am now simply stating the fact. It is true that the company received from the country an enormous bonus in money and lands, but it should not be forgotten that they faced enormous difficulty in attempting to build a road, offering the most amazing engineering problems, across a vast area of country at that time only partially settled, and a great part of which will, so far as we see, remain unsettled and non-producing for all time. It was, perhaps, fortunate that most of the Canadian directorate hailed from the land of the saying, "a stout heart to a stey brae," and few who know the way in which these men pledged their private fortunes and hazarded their business reputations will grudge the joy that must have been theirs when one of the most distinguished of their number, Sir Donald A. Smith, at Craig Ellachie, in 1885, drove the last spike in the band uniting oceans which lave the opposite shores of Canada. In fact, one cannot read the name of the place amidst the great mountain ranges where that notable act was done without thinking of the legends of Highland seers concerning the "grey frontlet of rock" which stood in the glen of Strathspey, and from whose summit the scattered firs and wind-swept heather in war time whispered to the clansmen, "Stand fast," for only by the most determined steadfastness could men have completed the task of which we have just spoken.

It was for some time quite fashionable to denounce the rapid construction of the C.P.R. as conducing to the scattering of population westward, and to say that the road should have been built by easy stages, and settlement consolidated in lateral directions. Apart from the fact that such a process would have been oblivious of the conditions upon which British Columbia entered Confederation, there was only a modicum of truth in the assertion that slower construction of the railway would have consolidated settlement, as early settlers who witnessed the movement of population can testify. There seems always to have been a westward moving instinct in humanity, and under its influence men have, from the beginning, been crowding towards the setting sun. In the West, long before a railway was dreamed of, I saw my own kith and kin leave the Red River colony to travel, amidst great difficulty, with cart-trains, five hundred miles north-westward and form a settlement there. Those who were in the country at the time know that during the construction of the C. P. R. emigrants left its trains at the various termini, and, loading their effects on "prairie schooners," pushed on, leaving good land unoccupied to the right hand and to the left.

For several years the Canadian Pacific Railway was the only railroad traversing the prairies west of Winnipeg. Then the Portage, Westbourne and North-Western (now the Manitoba and North-Western) Railway branched off from the Canadian Pacific Railway at Portage la Prairie, and took its way over the north-western part of the Province, heading for Prince Albert on the North Saskatchewan. From this road, in turn, there was built last year, beginning at Gladstone, the Lake Dauphin Railway, which strikes northward to the fertile areas in the direction of Lake Dauphin and Lake Winnipegosis, and which may become a route to the northern seaboard. Down through the beautiful districts of south-western Manitoba two lines of railway run from Winnipeg, tapping one of the richest grain districts of the West, also the soft coal deposits of the Estevan region; while north and north-westward short branches run to Stonewall and Selkirk. From the south the Northern Pacific Railway (the first to enter the field as a rival of the Canadian Pacific Railway) and the Great Northern Railway enter through the States, and over the road of the former the Grand Trunk Railway, eager for its share of western trade, is now running special colonist trains into Winnipeg. The Northern Pacific has also pushed westward, by two branches from Winnipeg, to Brandon and Portage la Prairie respectively. From Chater, on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the North-West Central Railway goes northward to Hamiota. Away out on its line towards the coast the Canadian Pacific Railway sends out offshoots in many directions. From Brandon a line runs south into the Souris district; from Regina a line goes to Prince Albert; from Calgary one strikes north-westward through the Red Deer country to Edmonton. Southward from the great transcontinental road a branch runs from Medicine Hat to the coal mines at Lethbridge, and from Calgary through the vast ranching country to Fort Macleod; while out in the rich mining districts of British Columbia branches tap every centre of any importance. For a long time the question of railway communication from the west to the east and south was a burning one in our politics, and as one charter after another passed by the Local Legislature in Manitoba was disallowed by the Dominion authorities, on the ground that the Canadian Pacific Railway, while still struggling, would suffer, feeling in the West rose sometimes to fever pitch. It was largely through a fruitless fighting on behalf of Provincial rights in this matter that the Norquay Government fell, but since the time when, shortly after the Greenway Administration took office, the Northern Pacific Railway entered the Province, we have had, as I have shown, railroads numerous enough. There are more to follow, and the change wrought in the course of a few years makes a marvellous contrast between the isolation of the early days and our present closeness of contact with all the great centres on the continent.

CHAPTER IX.

A "BOOM" AND ANOTHER REBELLION.

ONCE communication with the outside world was established, the growth of the country's life in all lines was comparatively rapid. We say "comparatively" in view of its former isolation, but there has never been what in western phrase would be called "a stampede" of immigration towards this country as compared with the influx of population other new lands have sometimes received. For that reason it is claimed that the conditions of life and work which now obtain in the West are much more solid and substantial than might be expected from the age of its history, inasmuch as the population came in so gradually that it has been readily assimilated and made part and parcel of the institutions of the land.

But though there has never been for any protracted period a rush into this country, our history is not altogether destitute of that adjunct to the progress of all young territories known as a "boom" time. That particular epoch came upon the West in the fall and winter of 1882-83. Just what began it we cannot say, except that there was general prosperity at that time in many parts of the world, and that capital looking for investment found its way to the new land whose resources were beginning to compel attention from without.

HON. THOMAS GREENWAY,

The "boom" opened in the fall of 1882, with the turning over of a few lots in Winnipeg, but as they went on turning over at considerable advance in price, men plunged wildly in, and the young city became in a few weeks a seething sea of real estate brokers, speculators and auctioneers. The auctioneers' rooms were a sight to see, as some man with "the dangerous gift of fluency" flourished a pointer with which he indicated the choice lots on a map, and expatiated on the merits of some coming Chicago to the men who clambered over each other in haste to buy. Fortunes were made and lost in a few days' time, figures became meaningless of real value, and we have known men without any available money make ten thousand dollars in a single evening. Fabulous prices were paid for all sorts of real estate, and "towns" with the slightest possible chance for the future commanded for their corner lots large figures, while places long leagues from railway communication were readily sold on the off chance of some railroad heading that way.

Great harm was done to the country by all this "wild-cat" speculation. The people themselves got inflated ideas and extravagant habits which they afterwards tried with disastrous results to maintain after the means to do so had been exhausted. The effect outside told terribly against the country. The many in different parts of the world who were "bitten" turned against the West, and denounced everything connected with it as a swindle and fraud. They themselves were to blame for the haste to be rich that impelled them to make investments ignorantly, but the specious accounts given them by the "land sharks" were set down against the country. When on a mission field in southern Manitoba, in 1890, one of my people received from a lady school-teacher in Ireland a sum of money to pay her taxes on town lots in a place called Pomeroy, and she asked on what street a certain family lived, and would he kindly send her a copy of the Pomeroy paper. At that date, Pomeroy consisted (as it still does) of a farm-house and a lot of surveyors' stakes on the virgin prairie, and there was no newspaper published within fifteen miles of it. This state of matters was gently hinted to the Irish school-teacher, with the result that she, like many others similarly situated, became the reverse of an emigration agent for Manitoba. But the "boom" drew widespread attention to the country, and scattered people far and wide over it westward towards the Rocky Mountains, and north-westward along the valleys of the great Saskatchewan. New territories with ever-growing autonomy were carved out on the prairies, with central points such as Regina, Calgary, Edmonton, Prince Albert, Battleford and other now thriving communities.

When Canada first took over the great North-West Territory, only a corner out of its vast area had been organized into a province, and called Manitoba; but in 1872 an Act was passed in Ottawa providing for the government of the unorganized territory by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and a council appointed by the federal authorities.

The members of this first Council, gazetted in January, 1873, are herewith given: Hons. M. A. Girard, Donald A. Smith, Henry J. Clarke, Patrice Breland, Alfred Boyd, John Schultz, Joseph Dubuc, A. G. B. Bannatyne, William Fraser, Robert Hamilton and William Christie.

To these were afterwards added: Hons. James McKay, Joseph Royal, Pierre Delorme, W. R. Bown, W. N. Kennedy, John H. McTavish and William Tait. This Council, presided over by Lieutenant-Governor Morris, of Manitoba, did exceedingly important service in trying times, and paved the way for fuller organization.

Acts were shortly afterwards passed by the Dominion Parliament, establishing the Mounted Police force and making rules for the regulation of trade, notably for the suppression of liquor selling, the Territories being put practically under prohibition, in order to keep liquor out of the reach of the inflammable and easily excited Indian population. Treaties had been made with the Indians far and wide, and such was the fairness with which the Government treated them, and such was the influence of the Mounted Police, that when the Custer massacre and similar events were taking place south of the boundary, on the north all was peace and comparative quietness.

In 1875 an Act for the fuller organization and government of the North-West Territories was introduced by the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie, and came into force in October, 1876, the Hon. David Laird being appointed the first lieutenant-governor, aided by a small Council consisting of Stipendiary Magistrates McLeod, Ryan, Richardson and Major Irvine (N.-W. M. P.), A. E. Forget, Secretary of the Council; M. St. John, Sheriff. The position of Governor Laird and his Council was not an easy one, as the changing conditions, the disappearance of the buffalo and other means of support, were throwing upon the Governor the burden of caring for and arranging about the future of almost the entire native population of Indians and half-breeds.

Gov. Laird was succeeded in the governorship by Hon. Edgar Dewdney, in 1881. The Territories were divided into local electoral districts, with a legislative assembly meeting at Regina, and into Dominion constituencies, with the privilege of sending four members to the House of Commons. The whole territory was divided into judicial districts, with experienced and able jurists at the head of each; and the vast domain was becoming the prosperous home of thousands when a second rebellion broke out in 1885, and for a time checked the progress by disturbing the peace of the land.

Just what gave rise to the North-West rebellion is perhaps more than anyone can definitely say. Political gladiators have fought the question over and over again to no definite end, and probably the great parties have their own opinion in the matter to this day, though they may be chary about telling all they know. It appears certain that the French half-breeds who were settled on the south branch of the Saskatchewan River (many of them being the same, or of the same, families as those concerned in the Riel rebellion of '69) were determined to hold to the old system of long narrow farms fronting on the river, as against the rectangular, or "square," survey proposed by the Government, which threatened to break up the homes they had built and overturn the old social life fostered by contiguous residence; and it seems also tolerably clear that many of the settlers had been waiting an extraordinarily long time for their land patents and scrip. These things were sufficient to unsettle the easily ruffled and somewhat turbulent half-breed element, and once anything like rebellion was contemplated, the aid of their duskier brethren all over the great plains was confidently expected.

The local authorities seem to have been singularly oblivious of the excitement that was afoot, and of the meetings that were being held for the redress of the wrongs alleged. They do not seem to have kept those at the seat of federal government properly informed as to the true state of matters at the scene of the discontent, nor of the important fact that many of the white settlers in the region sympathized with the malcontents at the outset, though deprecating the use of any but constitutional means for redress. But it is doubtful whether the discontent that seethed under the surface would ever have burst into active rebellion had not the agitators sent for Louis Riel, who since his first escapade had been living in the United States, and who at the time he was sent for was engaged in the quiet work of school-teaching in Montana. The malcontents felt that, with his energetic personality at their head, they could secure all the rights they claimed, and so despatched a deputation asking him to come and lead them in their struggle. The reply of Riel was exceedingly characteristic of the man, being a mixture of the egotist, the mercenary and the patriot, and in June, 1884, he accompanied the deputation back to the North-West. The very presence of the man on the ground should have put the local authorities on the alert. But either the local powers were making light of the situation, or else the pigeon-holes at Ottawa were receiving unread petitions, and so far as we can gather, we incline to the former as the more correct opinion. Then as anyone who knew Riel should have expected, the inevitable sequel came. He was a man easily excited and inordinately vain; hence, as he felt the wine of a new movement in his system, and became intoxicated with the success of his fiery appeals to the meetings that assembled, he broke out into amazing and extravagant pretensions. He openly separated from the Church of Rome, and such was his influence over the French half-breeds that he drew them from allegiance to their priests. He added David to his name, and called himself "Louis David Riel exovede," in allusion to both his kingly and his priestly claims; he established a Government with headquarters at Batoche, arrested whom he pleased, plundered the stores around, and sent word to Major Crozier, who commanded the Mounted Police at Fort Carlton, the nearest post, to surrender at once. This was rushing matters with a vengeance, and it is not surprising that, on the 19th of March, Major Crozier, hearing of these things, sent word to Prince Albert for help, and shortly afterwards despatched Thomas McKay, one of the Prince Albert volunteers, to remonstrate with Riel.

The McKay family did signal service for the country during the rebellion, there being no less than five brothers of them engaged in its suppression. Being natives of the country they were thoroughly at home in camp or in saddle, were deadly shots, had immense endurance and unmistakable courage. One of them, George, a canon in the Anglican Church, accompanied our column as chaplain and scout, and I can vouch for it that he could fight as well as pray.

When Thomas McKay reached Riel's Council at Batoche, he found things at white heat, and was told by Riel that there was to be a war of extermination during which "the two curses, the Government and the Hudson's Bay Company," and all who sympathized with them, were to be driven out of the country. "You don't know what we are after," said Riel to McKay. "We want blood, blood—it's blood we want." McKay, barely escaping with his life from such a gory atmosphere, returned to Carlton, and the next day, in company with Mitchell, of Duck Lake, met Nolin and Maxime Lepine (brother of Ambroise Lepine, Riel's adjutant in '69-'70), from Riel, demanding the surrender of Fort Carlton. This, of course, was refused, and in a few days rebellion was rampant with a madman at its head.

For many weeks previous Riel had been sending his runners amongst the Indians, and counted on a general uprising of the tribes, assuring them that the Government could easily be overthrown and that the whole country would be theirs again. We can forgive Riel for a good many things, but to justify his incitement of the Indians to murder and rapine is more than any reasonable person cares to undertake. As a rule the Indians were perfectly satisfied on the splendid reserves the Government had provided for them, were well cared for and taught, but the savage instinct was still strong in them, and to let them loose on defenceless homes with all the horrors of the scalping-knife and the torture, seems to take the man who is responsible for it out of the reach of ordinary consideration, and puts a tongue in every wound of the massacred calling for justice on the foul compasser of their death.

The first actual collision took place near Duck Lake, on March 26th, when Crozier, in an effort to secure stores from that point, met Gabriel Dumont, the redoubtable fighter, in command of a large force of half-breeds and Indians. A flag of truce was displayed by Dumont's party, but while parleying with the leaders Crozier saw that the rebels were surrounding his force of police and Prince Albert volunteers, and he immediately gave the order to fire. He, however, was directly in front, and his men held the fire of their 9-pounder on that account, though the gallant officer told them afterwards that they should have obeyed orders and shot him, if need be, with the enemy.

Firing became general, and after an hour Crozier and his men, who had acted throughout with the utmost coolness, were forced to retire before superior numbers, leaving twelve dead on the field and taking with them twenty-five wounded. They arrived at Fort Carlton, where they were joined two days afterwards by Col. Irvine, with eighty police and thirty more volunteers from plucky Prince Albert, and as there was no advantage in holding Fort Carlton, they retired from it to Prince Albert, where the greater portion of them remained till the close of the rebellion.

For this inaction the Mounted Police, than whom no more gallant force exists in the world, have been much criticised by ignorant people; but those who know that without them the most populous community in that part of the West would have been at the mercy of the now savage and excited enemy, honor the brave men who repressed their desire to be at the front, and loyally did less brilliant but not less important duty in defending the otherwise defenceless homes of the district.

Gabriel Dumont was certainly the most striking figure amongst the rebels in all the fighting which followed the battle at Duck Lake. He was living quietly enough upon his farm on the South Saskatchewan when the agitation began, but from his noted prowess and activity in the conflicts and hunts on the great plains in former years, became at once the acknowledged military leader of the rebel force. He was a man of magnificent physique and vast strength, a daring rider, a deadly shot, and, withal, possessed of undoubted dash and courage. It is not generally known that he was wounded at Duck Lake by a bullet which plowed along his scalp and felled him, stunned and bleeding, to the ground. There are some who say that after that experience he was more cautious about exposing himself. The incident, however, could not have materially affected his nerve, for it is well known to some that but for the interference of Riel he would, on a night of cold and rain, have led a "forlorn hope" in a midnight raid on Middleton's camp just before the fight at Fish Creek. How that raid would have eventuated it is useless to conjecture, but one who has passed nights in such a camp on such a night could easily see what confusion would be caused by a rush that would stampede the horses and produce a momentary panic. From their bearing in all situations during the campaign, we know that our boys would have been equal to the occasion; but from the rebel standpoint Dumont's proposition stamps him as a man of courage as well as of considerable strategic ability.*

The news of the disaster at Duck Lake sped like a flash to the hearts of the Canadian people, and the one thing of value that resulted from this wretched rebellion was the manner in which the spontaneous rush to arms manifested the spirit of the nation. Procrastinating officialdom had had its day. A Commission, consisting of Messrs. W. P. R. Street, A. E. Forget and Roger Goulet, was appointed, on the 30th March, to investigate the claims of the half-breeds, and when the Government, who never before seemed to be fully seized of the situation, started in vigorously to suppress the uprising, they found the people of all parties more than ready to second their efforts. The alertness with which the people answered the bugle's call to arms reminds one of the incident related by Scott in "The Lady of the Lake," when in answer to the shrill whistle of Roderick Dhu the sides of Ben Ledi swarmed with Highland clansmen, as

* No proceedings were ever taken against Dumont. He left the country for a time after the rebellion, but is now a peaceful resident.

" Every tuft of broom gave life
To plaided warrior armed for strife."

Scarcely had the story of Duck Lake reached the seat of Government at Ottawa, when from the frowning fortress of old Quebec to Halifax away down by the sea, from the populous cities and backwoods farms of Ontario to the scattered ranches at the foot-hills of the Rocky Mountains, hosts of armed men sprang up to defend the laws and liberties of the land they loved. As we look into the situation we do not wonder at this swift response to the country's call. There was something peculiarly touching and pathetic about the death on that ill-fated field of the young men from Prince Albert who had gone outside the ordinary routine of their life to help the authorities maintain order in the country. A friend in Prince Albert said to me, on the way back after the rebellion was over, "If one had picked out the men we could least afford to spare from the community, he would certainly have included the nine who were killed at Duck Lake." And so as the people of Canada heard of those who fell in the prime and glory of their young manhood, and thought that far away from their homes and the peaceful graves of their fathers they were sleeping their last long sleep, wrapped in the snow-shroud of the western prairies, and that, instead of the accents of those they loved, the last sounds that had fallen upon their ears were the mad rattle of the rifle and the fierce yellings of a treacherous foe, we are not surprised that a great wave of mingled sorrow and wrath swept over the country.

To these feelings that humanity would dictate add those of patriotism and national pride, and it is little marvel that when the uniform of the Queen was fired upon there was a mighty and immediate answer to the country's call. For sixty long years now the Queen has swayed a gracious and commanding sceptre over an empire so vast "that the beat of her morning drum, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, encircles the globe with one continuous strain of the martial airs of England." Over all this vast domain the story of the Queen's life has become one of the prized possessions of her subjects. Her career, so strangely chequered with joy and sorrow, has brought out perfect types of girlhood, wifehood and motherhood, while her strong common-sense has so linked her to the love and esteem of her people, that we can say in truth of her what Edmund Burke so vainly hoped for Marie Antoinette when he said: "I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to avenge even a look that threatened her with insult."

Hence we find the most strenuous action at once taken by the Government, who without delay sent forward General Middleton, the commander-in-chief of the Canadian forces, to take swift measures for the suppression of the rebellion.

General Middleton was a man of many battlefields, and though the North-West Rebellion provided new experience in a peculiar warfare, he bore himself throughout as a man of the utmost coolness and courage—in short, a true British soldier of the best type.

He arrived in Winnipeg on the 27th of

LIEUT.-COL. OSBORNE SMITH.

March, and left that same night for the scene with the 90th Rifles and the Winnipeg Field Battery. Troops from all parts of Canada, to the number of five or six thousand, were hurrying to the front, and in the West every district was furnishing a ready quota to the various bodies being raised for the occasion. Winnipeg and the Province of Manitoba, besides the battery, cavalry and Boulton's scouts, furnished three infantry regiments, two of them, the 91st, under Col. Scott, and the 92nd (Winnipeg Light Infantry), under Col. Osborne Smith, being specially enlisted in a few days for the suppression of the rebellion. With the latter regiment I had the honor to serve, and I purpose giving some personal recollections of the campaign such as have apparently been interesting to Canadian audiences at many points.

As indicated in the preface to this book, no attempt is made to give a complete record of the military operations of the whole force in the field. One can only be in one place at a time, and this volume is chiefly one of personal reminiscence; but it is hoped that the account here given, as written out from notes made nightly at the camp-fire, will be in some measure typical of the experience of all who went to the front.

CHAPTER X.

CAMPAIGNING ON THE PRAIRIES.

THE regiment known as the Winnipeg Light Infantry may be spoken of as one recruited out of almost every nation under heaven. The main body of it was made up of men enlisted in the city of Winnipeg, to which the noise of tumult had brought adventurers from every point of the compass, many of whom hailed the rebellion as a great windfall. Numbers of men just back from the Gordon Relief Expedition up the Nile fell readily into the ranks. Some of Indian, Irish, Scotch, English, Icelandic, German, French, and I know not what other extraction, were on hand, and I remember two men who followed our company to quarters one day and forswore their allegiance to the United States—till the close of the campaign, when, with four months' pay in their pockets, they shook the dust of Canada off their feet and returned to Chicago. One company, however, was enlisted in the old pioneer parish of Kildonan and contiguous points, from the farmers there, and another was enrolled from Minnedosa, a point some 150 miles distant to the north-west of the city. To the Kildonan company (afterwards No. 1 in the regiment) I, who was a native of the parish and at that time a student-at-law in Winnipeg, attached myself as a full private, though in the process of unaccountable events, and to my own great surprise, I became shortly afterwards second lieutenant.

It was significant of the times that our company had its barracks in a deserted "boom" house, whose hardwood floors made an excellent place for drill. After some scant preliminary training we left Kildonan, suitably farewelled, on the 13th of April, to join our regiment in the city. As we marched up, one of those incidents common in the experience of amateur soldiers occurred in passing the camp of the 9th Voltigeurs of Quebec. The guard turned out and presented arms, but we did not know how to return the compliment, and so kept on steadily as if they had not attracted our attention. Fortunately, however, we happened to be marching "at the shoulder," and I suppose that to this day the 9th have no idea that it was only by the merest chance in the world we did the right thing at the right time.

On Wednesday, the 15th, after being addressed by Lieutenant-Governor Aikins, our regiment marched to the C. P. R. station, and it was then known that we were under orders for the extreme north-west of the Territories, where the Frog Lake massacre had just taken place, and where the posts and settlements on the North Saskatchewan were in danger from the surrounding Indians. Soon the final farewells were said—for how long we knew not—and with many a last word and handclasp the severest ordeal of all was over, and the train moved out amidst the answering cheers of those going away and those left behind.

Doubtless many a stalwart uniformed figure was held in more than necessary military erectness, and many a voice firm enough in command was hushed lest a tell-tale tremor should reveal to others the sorrow felt at seeing lost in the heaving throng some dear and well-known face. But such feelings, however deep and constant, must be kept in check—soldiers, we thought, must be made of sterner stuff—and so before we had travelled many miles the usual gaiety of spirits, the amusing story and the patriotic song were in evidence, and no grim forebodings were allowed to displace the enjoyment of the hour.

The car in which No. 1 (Kildonan) Company travelled was certainly a jovial one, and a good deal of the mirth was at the expense of the guard at the door, a man who had been enlisted at the last moment from some outside point, when he was barely recovered from a prolonged spree, and who made grotesque efforts to spring to sober attention whenever the officer of the night passed through to see that all was well. The judgment of our color-sergeant, at whose request the man was enrolled, was amply vindicated during the campaign, for the wild-looking soldier of that first night, once beyond the reach of liquor, became one of the finest marchers in the regiment, and the head navigator for our flat-boat flotilla on the North Saskatchewan.

Our flying special "halted" at 11 a.m. of the next day at the town of Moose Jaw for breakfast, and the fast from the previous afternoon, together with the knowledge that we would soon be beyond the reach of what is ordinarily called a "square meal," led to such display of appetite that, when the regiment boarded the train, Moose Jaw must have somewhat resembled a country just traversed by an army of locusts.

Our next stop was at Gleichen, or Crowfoot Crossing, near the home of Crowfoot, the redoubtable chief of the Blackfoot Indians, whose reserve was near at hand. Crowfoot promised to be loyal, and he kept his word; but as the spirit of rebellion was abroad at the time, and young braves are easily roused, the Minnedosa Company was left here to repress any undue exuberance. We saw Crowfoot several times going to and from Calgary, a stern, stoical man, whose will was law for his tribe, and whose consistent loyalty was of great value to Canada during that troublous time.

To Calgary we came on the 17th of April, amid a drizzling rain and snow, but after the first night the weather, which Calgarians assured us was exceptional, cleared and was beautiful during the remainder of our stay. Some of the prophecies made concerning Calgary have not yet come true, but it is, nevertheless, one of the most perfect sites for a city in the west. We shall not soon forget the view from the great mound across the Elbow River in those spring evenings. The town, on its picturesque upland, lay peacefully quiet at the close of the day. Around it twined the glistening coils of the Bow and the Elbow rivers, which pour their united waters into the great Saskatchewan, while away to the west the Rockies, mighty monuments of the Creator's power, reared their snowy peaks against the purpling sky, resembling the vast tents of some giant host rising majestically above the plain.

Calgary, on its more material side, seemed that year the very paradise of cowboys, horse-men and scouts, for the place was full of the great rough, good-hearted fellows, fairly bristling with arms. Belts of cartridges round the waist and slashed across the chest held supplies for the Winchester rifle and Colt's revolver; great leather leggings, called "schaps," bowie-knives here and there about the person, huge jingling spurs, immense grey hats turned up at one side, "the cavalry swagger," and somewhat ferocious language were the prevailing characteristics. These men were magnificent riders, more at home in the saddle than on carpets, and as they had the run of the town, the sight of a number of them, with their wild horses at full speed along the principal streets, was quite common.

Most of us who had been brought up in the West knew something by experience of broncho-breaking, but it was worth while going to the corrals to see the broncho broken for use in our column. The horse, perhaps five or six years old, had never been handled except to be branded when a foal. He was dexterously lassoed, and (as the whole process is one of breaking rather than training) if necessary choked into submission. Sometimes the headstall was fastened with a blindfold, the great saddle was thrown on and tightly "cinched," then a cowboy leaped into the seat, locked his spurs and yelled "Let her loose!" There was a scattering of those holding the broncho, and a retrograde movement quickly executed on the part of the spectators as the trouble began. Sometimes the broncho, dazed for a few moments, stood with hunched-up back or walked quietly away for a few yards, then suddenly "exploded" into the air with terrific violence, and came down facing the opposite direction, with a continuation of such "bucking" as only a well-regulated broncho understands. The rider, however, was generally what westerners call a "stayer," and after a half-hour or so the broncho gave up and was pronounced "broken"; but we would not advise any of our tender-foot friends to mount the "hurricane deck" of a broncho, even though he may be broken enough for a cowboy's use.

Orders shortly came that our column was to march northward to the relief of Edmonton and the districts on the North Saskatchewan, which were being terrorized by Big Bear and his tribe, a portion of whom had massacred nine men at Frog Lake on the 2nd of April. Word, too, had just reached us of the fight at Fish Creek between Middleton and Riel, with heavy loss to our comrades.

The Fish Creek fight was evidently planned by Gabriel Dumont as a surprise for our troops, and it certainly did come upon them with unexpected suddenness. It would be utterly wrong to say, as some have said, that Middleton walked into a trap, for he had his mounted infantry and Boulton's scouts well spread out in front in proper form. But men who were in the advance guard of the 90th have told me that the first indication of the enemy's presence they had was in seeing several of the scouts in front fall from their saddles under the deadly fire of the half-breeds concealed in the bluffs. The main body of the volunteers was soon brought up to support the scouts, and the fighting became general. A ravine near by afforded almost perfect cover to the enemy, and from it a hot fusilade was poured upon the advancing troops. Dumont's men also set the prairie on fire so that the smoke would confuse the volunteers, but they put out the fire and advanced steadily, adopting the enemy's tactics and taking cover as much as possible. After some hours the half-breeds, except a few in the ravine, were dislodged from their position, and as a heavy thunderstorm was beginning Middleton decided to form camp for the night. In this fight eleven of our men were killed or died subsequently of wounds, and a large number were wounded more or less seriously. When this news reached us at Calgary, just as we were under orders for the north, our letters home probably took on a final farewell flavor, and, withal, contained bequests of our worldly goods as holograph wills.

When we marched out towards Edmonton on the afternoon of the 27th we had but 165 men of our own regiment, the rest being on detachment duty, but we had two small bodies of Mounted Police and scouts under command of Major Steele, Major Hatton and Capt. Oswald. About six miles out we crossed the Bow River by fording, and this was one of the first of many picturesque scenes on our route. The river was wide and swift-flowing, the water where we crossed on the stony bottom being from two to four feet deep. The loaded wagons, with four and six horses or mules driven by skilful though somewhat profane teamsters, the red-coated soldiers, the Mounted Police in scarlet and gold, and the picturesque corps of scouts, all passing through the water together, made a view worthy of being placed on canvas. Occasionally the scene would be spoiled by a mule throwing himself down in the water, but the free use of the black-snake whip, with the freer use of language not to be repeated here, overcame the obstinacy of the animal. A few miles farther out we camped for the night. A marvellously beautiful night it was, and I shall not soon forget how still and white the encampment looked under the splendor of the moon as it shone upon the tents grouped together on the wide prairie. It was probably on such a night that the young shepherd watching his flocks on the uplands of Canaan saw the infinite stairways of stardust that "sloped through darkness up to God," and exclaimed, "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?" Few men remain wholly unmoved under a study of the starry heavens, and doubtless many a sentry beneath those eloquent skies night after night drank in new messages as to the sublimity and goodness of God.

The next morning the strident notes of the bugle-band sounded reveille at half-past four, and breaking camp early we marched twenty-five miles our first day. On we went with the usual round of marching by day and guard by night till we came to the Red Deer River, where, it being high-water time, we were stopped by what Adjutant Constantine (now in command of the Mounted Police in the Yukon country) called "a wide, swift-flowing and treacherous stream." After many futile attempts a rude ferry was constructed, upon which, under the pilotage of Sergt. Pritchard, of No. 1 Company, we all crossed in safety, and set out on our march of 110 miles to Edmonton.

On May 7th we came upon the first bands of Indians, numerous enough and of the Cree tribe, under chiefs bearing the not very classical names of Ermine-Skin, Cayoté, and Bobtail.

Whether these were disposed to be hostile or not we did not know, but our Colonel held the men in readiness for any event; and then, with bayonets fixed and rifles at the slope, with band playing and every weapon exposed to view, we marched through, while the Indians gathered in the woods by the roadside and gazed wonderingly at the spectacle.

We reached Edmonton on May 8th, and encamped south of the town in the midst of wigwams. The Indians were loyal enough now, with flags displayed from the tepees, in the presence of an armed force; but the Edmonton people gratefully assured us that only the timely arrival of our column had prevented repetitions of the Frog Lake massacre at many points along the North Saskatchewan. At Edmonton we met the commander of our brigade, General Strange, who with part of that plucky regiment, the 65th of Montreal, and a detachment of Mounted Police under Major Perry, had preceded us a few days. General Strange was a retired British army officer, who was living on a ranch near Calgary when the rebellion broke out, and was given command of our column. He had done signal and distinguished service as an officer of artillery in the Indian mutiny and elsewhere, and in every respect was a splendid type of the British soldier. Somewhat eccentric in certain ways, he was, withal, as kindly of heart as he was brusque of manner, and so cool and courageous that by the end of the campaign every man in the column had personal affection for him, and would have gone at his command wherever men could go. On this occasion, at Edmonton, General Strange made a speech complimenting the men highly on the swift march they had made. The speech was delivered in characteristic soldier style, with few words, and these shot out with quick emphasis, like the firing of bullets. As we crossed the ferry and marched into Edmonton, we saw the picturesque town, with its Hudson's Bay post, the great distributing point for the Company's fur-trade, rising high on the north bank of the North Saskatchewan, and stretching out over considerable territory. Edmonton had borne its part in the "boom," and was mainly responsible for the breaking of it, as some men, coming to themselves, realized how foolish they had been to buy lots at an enormous figure in a place, at that date, 210 miles from even a prospective railway station (though it is now connected by rail with the C.P.R. from Calgary).

We remained at Edmonton a few days while flat-boats were being made to take us down the river, and I especially remember that with the lavish hand of the soldier of Epicurean philosophy, we spent our scanty cash in buying up the ancient stock of delicacies (?) from the Hudson's Bay store. Dried apples and prunes, ginger bread of rocky firmness, canned fruit, and such like, found their way to our tents, and on these unaccustomed delicacies we fared sumptuously for several days. On the 14th of May we embarked in open flat-boats to go down the river, greatly to the dismay of our Edmonton friends, who asserted that the Indians would enjoy the sport of standing on the high banks and "potting" us as we went by. Well do I remember the first night out, when our flat-boats were tied to trees and we encamped in a storm, half rain, half snow, for the night, for I was officer in command of the picket. The twenty-five men fell in as best they could to be inspected in the darkness and on the sliding mud of the bank. Then we groped our way through the wet bush some distance to the rear of the camp, where we posted our line of sentries, while the rest of the picket huddled together under the dripping trees. The work of relieving sentries was made difficult by the very darkness of the forest; but the slightest movement drew out the hoarse challenge, and the sentry thus found always gladly welcomed the relief. At four o'clock we came in, roused the camp, got on board breakfastless, and moved down the river in a driving snow-storm, with our clothes standing upon us like icy coats of mail. On the 16th we landed at Fort Victoria, which had been recently looted by Big Bear and his band, who were now sullenly retreating before us with all the prisoners and their ill-gotten plunder.

On Sunday, the 17th, we had three church services. In the morning Col. Smith, assisted by Adj. Constantine and Surgeon Pennyfather, read the Church of England service, with the big drum for a pulpit; in the afternoon the well-known Methodist minister, the Rev. John McDougall, of Morley, who was with our column, preached in a long building near by; while Mr. Mackenzie, the Presbyterian chaplain to the Mounted Police, became a "field preacher," and conducted service in the woods in the evening.

Reference already has been made to the amateur drill witnessed on such an expedition as this, and an incident that occurred at the close of the morning service was, I fear, more discussed and made more impression than the service itself. It being the official church parade, the whole regiment was formed up in three sides of a square, facing in to the "pulpit." When service was over the Colonel turned the parade over for dismissal to another member of the staff. This officer faced the situation, and knew just enough about drill to know that he should get the men back into line before giving the "dismiss," but how to get them there in military order was more than he could tell for the life of him. But he was a man of resource, and boldly went at it. "Regiment! Attention! Men on the sides, backwards wheel." They, however, had never heard such an order before and had never practised circus drill, so they remained motionless till Sergt.-Major (now Capt.) Lawlor, a Crimean veteran, who often had to unravel tangles during our campaign, came to the rescue and dismissed the parade in the orthodox way.

While at Fort Victoria, in "the enemy's country," orders had been issued that no man should leave the camp; but failing to understand the full purport of this, a soldier who was an ardent disciple of Izaak Walton got an old punt and pushed across the river to a likely-looking creek to do some fishing. His return was witnessed by the Colonel, who happened to be on the bank, and that officer immediately sent the sergeant of the guard (Sutherland, of No. 1 Company) to arrest and bring the man before him. To Sutherland's surprise the "outlaw" proved to be Pritchard, one of his fellow-sergeants in No. 1, who submitted good-humoredly to the arrest, but insisted on bringing his string of fish with him. The Colonel was equally surprised, Pritchard being a favorite all round, and the very opposite of a wilful offender; but as the sergeant had been of prime service to the column in crossing the Red Deer River, and as he moreover gravely avowed that he had been intending the best fish for the Colonel's dinner, that officer, keeping his face straight with great difficulty, administered a reprimand and set the offender at liberty.

On May the 20th we left Fort Victoria on our march overland after Big Bear, who had "looted" all the posts between Edmonton and Battleford, and at Fort Pitt, near the scene of the Frog Lake massacre, had received the surrender of Mr. W. J. McLean, the Hudson's Bay officer in charge, together with all his family and employees, whom he now held as prisoners. To secure the release of these prisoners and to break up the armed force of the Indians became now the objects of our expedition, and as the sequel showed, both these objects were accomplished, happily without much immediate loss of life.

Various points northward were passed, such as Saddle Lake (where some of the atrocities had been committed, the leader in which, a giant Indian named Mamanook, was shot with some others by Steele's scouts a few days after this), Egg Lake and Dog Rump Creek, not far from Frog Lake. During these days the rain fell almost incessantly; it was a case of marching in the mud by day and sleeping in our wet clothes by night. To make matters worse, our commissariat was not well supplied, and until further supplies, which were being brought from Edmonton, would reach us, we were on half rations. It was an uncomfortable predicament to be in, and I remember standing by a camp-fire which the rain was like to extinguish, and distinctly envying two scouts who were enjoying a repast of "hard tack" and black tea after a day of hard riding.

On May 23rd, after a long day's march, we had orders to camp on the low ground beneath a ridge to avoid advertising our presence to the Indians, but the place was a shaking bog, and after a few vain attempts to prevent the tent-poles and pegs from going through towards the antipodes, Surgeon Pennyfather refused to risk the health of the men by asking them to sleep there, and preferred rightly to have them risk their lives as targets on the ridge, where we accordingly encamped.

On the following morning reveille sounded as usual at 4.30, and we rose from our cheerless bivouacs on the muddy ground. At 5.10 we fell in amidst drenching rain and driving wind, and were addressed by General Strange as follows:

"Col. Osborne Smith, officers and men of the Winnipeg Light Infantry, you have marched well. I know that you will stick to me, and we will stick to Big Bear's trail as long as our grub lasts. This is the Queen's birthday; we have no time to celebrate and can't have fireworks, but let us hope we soon will have fireworks with the enemy. Boys, three cheers for the Queen ; God bless her !”

To my mind no incident during the campaign more amply demonstrated the loyal hearts of our boys. It is easy to make a fair showing and to feel enthusiasm on the parade ground amidst a cheering throng of spectators, but the environment of our boys was different that morning. They were away out on the hillside in the solitary wilderness, rain-drenched in the driving storm, but at the name of the Queen they stood in the ranks with heads uncovered, and when the old General called for cheers the shout that went up might well have rent the concave of the low-hanging clouds. Then the General, who with all his bluff exterior was an earnest Christian, said :

“Boys, this is also Sunday, but we have no time for service to-day ; we must push on the march. I am reminded of an old soldier, who on going into battle prayed, ‘O God, I often forget thee. I will be very busy to-day. I am sure to forget thee, but do not forget me.’ Boys, we will sing together, ‘Praise God from whom all blessings flow,’” and this old doxology was sung by the regiment ere we began another day’s forced march.

That evening we reached Frog Lake, the scene of the terrible massacre some weeks before, and by special order slept every man on his arms, as we were reported by the scouts to be surrounded by Indians who might attack us during the night. Next morning Sergt.-Major Lawlor, with a fatigue party, buried the bodies of those who had been massacred there some weeks before. The charred remains of the heroic priests, Fathers Marchand and Fafard, who had thrown themselves between the savage Indians and the whites, were recognized by the beads and crosses they wore, but all the others were little more than indistinguishable ashes. A look around the reserve showed how inexcusable was the rising of the Indians, who were treated so well by a paternal Government, and caused one to feel how utterly devilish was the action of those who by plausible messages had caused these easily excited and merciless savages to bite and destroy the hands that fed them. The reserve, as it lay before us that morning, was one of the most beautiful spots in all the wide country we traversed that year. "Fair as a garden of the Lord," it stretched afar, a flower-flecked prairie, diversified by shady groves and sparkling lakes; but the houses were all burned or wrecked, all implements were destroyed, murder and rapine had made their horrid havoc, and war flags of hideous colors on every side mocked the pure breeze of heaven. Sun-dance lodges were standing there and at several points along our route thenceforward, to overawe the soldiers with evidences of the bravery of those who had taken part in the wild orgies these lodges represented. From their rafters still dangled the cords on which the young braves had hung by hooks in their lacerated flesh till, as they danced wildly around, the portion was torn out, and their recklessness of pain was admitted beyond a doubt. It was a mingled scene that met our gaze as we stood on the shores of Frog Lake that day—a mingled scene of beauty and desolation, reminding us again of the world, still untouched by the Gospel, “where every prospect pleases and only man is vile.”

We left Frog Lake and pushed on by a forced march of forty-one miles to Fort Pitt, which our scouts reported the Indians were burning, and which we reached late in the evening only to find the fort (except two buildings) a heap of smoking ruins and the Indians vanished in retreat. As we came down over the brow of the river bank to the fort we found the body of young Cowan, the mounted policeman, who had been killed by the Indians some weeks before. His body lay naked with face upturned to the open sky. The scalping-knife had not touched his fair hair, but from wounds in the breast it appeared that the Indians, who believe that if they eat a brave man's heart they will get his spirit and courage, had followed that course in the case of the young trooper. They certainly had cause to know of his bravery. He and Constable Loasby had been out from the fort scouting towards Frog Lake, and on their return found the Indians in force along the slope towards the place where their comrades were standing siege. Putting spurs to their horses they made a desperate effort to cut their way through to the fort, but the odds were too great. They were both shot—Cowan dead; but Loasby, whose roan charger we found nearer the fort, was only wounded, and after simulating death awhile to deceive the enemy, he escaped into the stockaded inclosure.

As soon as possible after finding the body of Cowan, his comrades of the Mounted Police dug a grave and reverently buried it, the rattle of their musketry his only funeral requiem, but nothing could more vividly tell the record of a man who worthily wore the uniform of his Queen and died a soldier's death. A few years since, when relating the story of the rebellion, I was glad to hear, from one who stated that he was young Cowan's cousin, that the body thus buried on that lonely bank was exhumed the next winter by order of the young soldier's mother, and taken down to be laid in the place of his father's sepulchre hard by the city of Ottawa.

We hurriedly put in defensible shape the two buildings which remained, left a company of the 65th to hold them, and after a swift march of about eight miles, to a point where two Indians had been shot in a skirmish by Steele's scouts the night before, came within reach of the enemy, as we soon learned definitely by hearing the bullets whistling over our heads. It had been a long chase from the point of starting, but despite all Indian expectations to the contrary, our General had fully made up his mind to "stick to Big Bear's trail" and accomplish the breaking up of his band, if it should take all summer. Hence there was great satisfaction when the routine of the long march was varied on that 27th of May by our coming into contact with the wily and light-footed foe.

CHAPTER XI.

REBELLION AT AN END.

THE place in which we now met the enemy was full of ravines and heavily wooded. The Indians were seen along the top of the hill in front of us, seemingly holding the position. Our little force was thrown into line, with Hatton's scouts to the right and Steele's to the left. On our side the old 9-pounder, which Perry's men had brought from Fort McLeod, opened by sending a shell screaming into the thicket on the hill-top, in a way that must have been extremely unsettling to the nerves of the braves who occupied the place. Then the order came to us to advance, and we rushed forward in skirmishing order, the Indians meanwhile keeping up a scattering fire. We halted for breath, and I remember feeling rather amused at Major Steele, who warned me to take cover, saying, "If you don't, they will pot you sure," while at the same time he seemed to forget about his own colossal figure seated on a horse seventeen hands high. Once more the bugle broke in with the "Advance," and the line rushed up the hill and over the summit only to find the Indians retreating and leaving us in possession. For some hours we skirmished through the woods, and then our wagon train having come up we camped in the forest for the night.

Humanly speaking, I have never been able to make out why the enemy, who were in force outnumbering us three to one, did not make short work of us in the darkness. The clearing in which we encamped was small and surrounded by dense forest, the wagons were in zarefa form with all the men and horses inside, and the night was intensely dark. The Indians must have been already in panic, or, with their knowledge of the situation, they might have rushed in, stampeded our horses, and in the confusion done serious execution. With the sunrise we moved on again, and soon encountered the enemy in a position which a glance showed to the merest amateur to be impregnable to our handful if held by any considerable force. The Indians occupied a steep conical-shaped hill, moated by a deep valley and marshy stream, topped with forest and fortified with rifle-pits, there being, as we afterwards found, no less than five rows of rifle-pits along the ravine by which they expected to be assailed. For some hours the fight was kept up sharply. Our men were in the open, but, strangely enough, only four were wounded, though afterwards many proudly exhibited caps shot through, etc., as evidence of close-enough calls. The enemy were practically invisible, and little could be seen to indicate their presence but the puffs of smoke from their rifles and the "ping" or thud of the bullets around us. About ten o'clock their firing had practically ceased, except for scattering shots from the pits. We afterwards learned the Indians were then in retreat; but the scouts were of opinion that the retreat was a ruse, and that the enemy were coming round behind us (as some of them actually did) to cut off our wagon train and hem us down in the valley.

In a letter I received from General Strange some years afterwards, he said in reference to this engagement: "My force would have gone in to a man, if I had allowed them, but I had the lessons of Fish Creek and Cut Knife before me," implying that he did not feel warranted in risking the lives of his men in a possible trap, against the opinion and advice of the column's "tentacles." So the men were slowly retired by companies till the wagon zareba was reached, when a camp was formed and the wounded men looked after. Word was then sent down the river to General Middleton, at Battleford, for ammunition and reinforcements.

On the day following Major Steele offered to take a flying column and follow the Indian trail, and accordingly, with about fifty picked men out of the Police, the Alberta Rifles and Oswald's scouts, he left camp, accompanied by the "grey team" and wagon with ammunition and supplies. I remember how these fellows—magnificent riders, every one of them—wheeled out on the gallop, and followed where the tracks showed that most of the Indians had gone. We saw no more of them for days, but they kept to the trail and came upon the main body of the Indians at Loon Lake, where a brilliant dash was made upon the enemy, who retired across an almost impassable morass. In this hot, if brief, engagement several Indians bit the dust, and Steele's sergeant-major (Fury by name), and two of the scouts (Fisk and West), were wounded. Fury was very seriously hurt, being shot through the breast and rendered perfectly helpless. Steele's only course, with these wounded men on his hands and no transport or ambulance, was to retire toward the main body, leaving the Indians continuing their journey to the north.

Another of our own companies having come down from Edmonton with much-needed supplies just as Steele left us, we marched back to the scene of our encounter at Frenchman's Butte, only to find that the enemy had vanished, leaving every evidence that they had fled in the wildest panic. The encampment was nearly intact, with the wigwams standing. Great heaps of furs (which went quickly we know not whither), wagons, carts, flour, bacon, cooking utensils, etc., lay around in the greatest disorder, as if they had become of very secondary importance in the race for life. Concerning the furs a good deal has been said even in the sober debates of our Houses of Parliament, but there is not much certainty as to where they were finally bestowed. The staff officers in all the brigades were mightily blamed by those who were themselves angry at not getting a haul, but it is quite likely, according to my observation, that the teamsters, who had the great advantage of receptacles in which to carry parcels, could unfold tales that would exonerate the poor officers from at least a part of the blame.

Standing that day in a pelting rain-storm, we surveyed the position recently held by the enemy and wondered why they had not kept on holding it, so excellently was it suited for standing a long siege. Then going out to the plain beyond we encamped to wait for orders from Middleton, while our scouts tried to locate the scattering trails of the fleeing Indians. While we remained there, several of the white prisoners who had escaped during the fight and confused retreat were brought into camp by the scouts, rejoicing at having regained once more a freedom which they doubtless at times had despaired of ever obtaining, as from day to day hope deferred had made their hearts sick.

Here, too, I remember seeing one of those touches of nature which make the whole world kin. One of the roughest riders and apparently one of the most reckless of the cowboy scouts was seen coming into camp, leading his rougher horse and carrying carefully upon his arm a small wooden box, such as originally might have contained groceries of some kind. At once curious men gathered in a knot at the edge of the camp, and wondered what find Jack (as we will call him) had made. As he approached, one of the men stepped in his way and lifted the cover of leaves, unveiling the wan dead face of a white child some few months old, whose body had thus been reverently confined and covered by the hand of the mother and left in the woods as the prisoners were dragged along. The man whose curiosity had tempted him to discover the nature of Jack's "find" started to make some contemptuous remark to the crowd, but the scout's eyes flashed such a dangerous fire that the remark stopped short, and the rest made way for that strange funeral procession. Picketing his wild broncho, the scout dug a grave with his own hands, and with a gentleness that would have done that mother's heart good, committed the little body to the ground. After all, we are every one of us under the influence of an unseen world. Perhaps the quiet sympathy Jack had with the unknown mother's grief, or perhaps the tender recollections of child-life as he remembered it, made that rough scout for the time being as gentle as a woman, or it may have been that sometime in an older land he had laid his own dead under the sod, and his heart went back to that God's-acre where a mother was sleeping with their infant child upon her breast.

On the 21st of May, General Strange, feeling that we were close on the enemy, had thought it well to send despatches to Col. Otter at Battleford, acquainting him with the situation, so that, if necessary, a junction could be effected between his force and ours for the hemming in of the Indians and the disposal of the whole question. Two scouts, George Borradaile (now Crofter Commissioner in Winnipeg) and William Scott (whose present whereabouts I do not know), were selected for the difficult and dangerous enterprise. It was an undertaking requiring both courage and resource, to go down by the river through the enemy's country. A somewhat clumsy boat was the means of travel, and the two scouts made a perilous run in the shadows of night past Fort Pitt, which the Indians were even then setting on fire. When the scouts reached Battleford, General Middleton had arrived there from Batoche. The despatch was delivered, and when next morning the scouts were to return on the south side of the river, Borradaile asked for a revolver, as he had lost his in a mishap by the upsetting of the boat on the way down. The General, much to Borradaile's disgust, said that he himself would go through that country with a stick; but when he did come, as General Strange said, "he brought two infantry regiments, a troop of cavalry, and artillery." The scouts made the return trip safely, though under considerable strain, and reached Fort Pitt again on the 29th of May, the day after our fight at Frenchman's Butte, but in time to take a hand in the Loon Lake expedition.

At this point in our campaign some of our officers—Capt. Wade, Lieut. Mills and Sergt.-Major Lawlor—left us, being called back to Winnipeg by their duties as government officials. Perhaps there was no man in our regiment so deservedly popular as the sergeant-major, and before he went, though not a man given to speech-making, he responded to the demand of the boys, and bade them farewell in a few words. I can still see the scene before me. It is a dark weird night, with here and there a glimpse of the moon through the rifts of the flying clouds. Near the camp-fire is the wagon which is to carry the officers homeward, and around it the group of red-coats, which includes nearly every man off duty. Beside the wagon, with one hand resting lightly on a wheel, stands the sergeant-major, his tall, powerful figure erect as ever, his grey beard sweeping the broad breast on which glisten, in the flickering light of the camp-fire, three medals, the rewards of his sovereign for services in the Crimea and China. After referring to the long weary marching, and then to the fight which followed, he said that “he was glad that this, probably the last of his many campaigns, had been undertaken with men who had proven themselves of such good stuff as the men of the Winnipeg Light Infantry.” It was warm praise from a man who was in the habit of saying only what he meant, and as the wagon drove out and was lost in the darkness, many a poor fellow who had done his best felt his heart swell at the words of the veteran soldier.

our comrades nearer to the centre of the rebellion had been doing some very active service. A brigade under Col. Otter had, after an exceptionally swift march from Swift Current, relieved Battleford, which had been in a state of siege for months, and then, not without severe loss to themselves, inflicted deserved chastisement on Chief Poundmaker and his marauding band at Cut Knife. Farther eastward, at the fiery heart of the trouble, General Middleton had captured Batoche, the stronghold of Riel.

The advance from Fish Creek had been carefully made. Batoche was Riel's "last ditch," and after the battle General Middleton himself expressed wonder at the splendid use the rebels had made of the means at their disposal to hold the position. The fight continued for four days, when, the volunteers seemingly growing restive under the protracted manœuvring, made a brilliant charge and carried the position with a rush. The gallantry of all the troops engaged is undisputed, and the list of nine killed and forty-six wounded evidences the keenness of the struggle.

The day after Batoche Riel was found by Scouts Hourie and Armstrong. Hourie took him up on the saddle and brought him into camp, whence he was sent to Regina, with a special guard under Capt. George H. Young, of the Winnipeg Field Battery. There Riel remained through the eventful trial, during which the plea of insanity was raised in vain, and there he was executed on the 16th of November, 1885, meeting his death manfully. His body was given to his friends, and now rests in the graveyard at St. Boniface beneath a granite pillar on which is engraved the single word "RIEL." I was present at the funeral service in the old cathedral, and was deeply impressed by the evident sorrow of the people whose cause he had, with many mistakes, espoused.

TOM HOURIE.

Returning to the field, we find Middleton moving with his column, by way of Prince Albert, to Battleford, where he demanded and received the unconditional surrender of Poundmaker on the 26th of May, the day before our first skirmish with Big Bear. This left the Commander-in-Chief free to move in our direction and effect such a concert with the force under General Strange as would secure the hemming in and capture of the retreating Indians. Accordingly, Middleton with a strong force came on to Fort Pitt, and leaving his infantry there in camp, reached the point where we were with his mounted men and artillery. There a new plan of campaign was decided on. General Strange's column of infantry was to march northward to the one (as was then supposed) crossing of the Beaver River, while General Middleton, with all the mounted men, was to follow after the main trail of Big Bear and force him up to us at the crossing, where between two fires the matter could soon be settled. Accordingly, we started out next morning to perform our part of the contract, and that night camped at Onion Lake in one of the most terrific thunderstorms I ever witnessed—an amazing and overwhelmingly grand spectacle. The continuous flashing of lightning transformed the prairie with its waving grass into a heaving, tossing sea of flame, while the incessant boom and crash of the thunder, awe-inspiring in the extreme, reminded us of the feeble strength of all earthly force, the puny power of boasted arms before the flash and roar of the artillery of heaven.

All the next day our forced marching was continued through roads almost impassable and innumerable places where the wagons had to be pulled out by the men, and towards evening Indians were reported ahead near the Beaver River crossing. It was decided to make what became known in the rebellion annals as "the silent march," and so leaving our wagon train, the horses being completely tired out, we started marching again about eight o'clock in the evening. For quite a distance our way was through water knee-deep, and through this swamp I remember how the Frenchmen of the 65th, almost shoeless and half-clad though they were, more than once helped the horses on Perry's gun, next to which they were marching. It was night when we struck the heavy and practically trackless forest, for there was scarcely any trail to be found. The darkness grew denser as we advanced, and the great trees meeting above us shut out the sky. Sometimes in rank, and sometimes in Indian file, we kept on marching in dead silence, with our arms ready for instant use, until about two o'clock in the morning, when a halt was ordered, and by little twig fires—larger were not allowed—we tried to dry our wet and well-nigh frozen garments.

As the day began to dawn we moved on again, and by sunrise arrived at the point near the Beaver River where the Indians had been seen, but found they had vanished. Evidences of their recent presence, however, were at hand, for we found about one hundred bags of flour cached in the woods. This was a "windfall," as by this time bread was little more than a distant memory, and even "hard tack" was scarce enough to be appreciated. The brigade supply officer, however, took formal possession of the cache of flour, lest the men should get enough to eat for once; but by various devices known to soldiers, such as putting two "kits" in one rubber sheet, and a bag of flour in the other, they rescued a good deal of it from his rapacious clutches, and fared sumptuously, if somewhat secretly, for several days.

Next morning we marched to the Beaver River, where we had orders to wait until General Middleton, whom we left starting out after Big Bear from the scene of our fight, should force him up to us. However, had we done so, we should have had a weary waiting.

The General, following on Steele's trail, met that officer with his command returning from Loon Lake. The wounded were sent back to the main column, and Steele, although his horses and men were much spent, turned back with the General to the scene of the Loon Lake fight. After careful investigation of the ground, Middleton decided that with his guns and heavy horses he could not cross the shaking bog over which the light-footed Indians with their nimble ponies had made their way. He accordingly concluded to turn back, on finding which the Indians also deflected their course, instead of running up to receive our welcome.

In the afternoon of the day we arrived at the Beaver River, No. 1 Company was ordered out under arms to accompany Colonel Smith to the river, about a mile and a half away, to find a suitable crossing should we have to go farther. Here we found another cache made by the Chippewyan Indians, filled with articles for priests' wear and church services, which they probably thought they could dispense with while on the war-path. The scenery at this point is very fine. The river, flowing swiftly eastward, is joined by a small stream from the south; the banks are very high and so densely wooded from top to bottom that the foliage seems to be piled in green luxuriance to the very summit. I got permission from the Colonel to take the men down to see the river, and away we went rushing down the steep to the water's edge. There the place is a magnificent natural park. Grand trees, perfectly straight and with few boughs, tower aloft; there is no undergrowth, and the whole place is a perfect picnic-ground. In fact, it so struck one of our fellows, who remarked, "Boys, this would be a great place for the people at home to hold their Sunday-school picnics"; but as we were then nearly two thousand miles from home by the route we had followed, we did not think it necessary to discuss the question seriously.

On coming again to the top and turning eastward, the view that met our eyes was marvellously beautiful. The sun, which was slowly sinking, struck his shafts across the river and lit the tree-tops beyond. The sunbeams glowing and glinting in mellow radiance on the great clouds of foliage on the towering banks, the river flashing and twining in and out through the forest like some serpent-fish with silvery scales, the sparkling of the little tributary stream, of which one could catch glimpses away down through a veil of green boughs, all together made up a scene rarely surpassed even in the great picture gallery of nature. A few moments we stood gazing on the wondrous view, and then the word to fall in being given, we reluctantly left the scene and marched back to camp.

That night our outlying picket was fired upon, but in the deep darkness and fog nothing could be done except arouse the camp, keep the whole picket under arms, and wait for the day. On that day a band of Chippewyan Indians, with a Roman Catholic priest at their head, came in, and surrendering unconditionally, laid down their arms in a heap at the feet of the General. One could not help feeling sorry for the poor fellows. They did not appear to be a bad lot, but seemed to have been dragged by threats, rather than their own inclination, into rebellion. From the day they surrendered they certainly became a great help to us in many ways, and did their utmost to discover the whereabouts of the bands who still held certain of the white prisoners.

On the next day, Sunday, June 14th, we had service by the Rev. John McDougall inside the zareba. What a motley congregation was there assembled!—some on the wagons, some on the prairie, and some seated on their saddles on the ground. Here a mounted policeman in faded scarlet and gold stood beside a scout with his wide slouch-hat and general air of carelessness; there an infantry man with coat, once red, now like Joseph's—of many colors—sprawled on the grass beside some rough western teamster, whose respect for the minister's cloth kept him quiet, but who, if personally interviewed, might not hesitate to avow heterodoxy in his favorite terse expression, "Difference here, pardner." To the credit of these rough men be it said, I never saw amongst them anything but the most respectful attention to these services, and often one could see their bronze faces light up with a surprising tenderness as they, perchance, recalled the days when they had heard from a mother's lips the same old, but ever new, story of the Cross.

Next day General Strange accepted the offer made by Colonel Smith a few days previously, to take one hundred picked men from the Winnipeg Light Infantry, cross the river and strike northward to a chain of lakes, where he shrewdly, and, as the sequel proved, correctly, thought some of Big Bear's band might have gone with the remaining prisoners. Regimental orders quickly required Companies 1, 2 and 3 to furnish the men, and perhaps the "picking" consisted largely in a selection of those who had some remnants of boots left, and whose uniforms could be counted on as likely to hold together a little while longer.

We (for the writer was fortunate enough to be one of the hundred) were ordered to leave all transport except the Indians' pack-horses, and each man was to carry his own outfit strapped upon his back, as the country through which we were about to travel was impassable to all but foot-soldiers and the nimble pony of the plains. We crossed the river by sections, in two birch canoes, and there left Color-Sergt. Sutherland with [a party of five men to build a boat on which to cross the rest of the force if required. We then struck north, and made about five miles that night. Having no tents or other covering, we lay down under the starry canopy of heaven to sleep upon delightful couches of pea-vine on a grassy ridge beside a lake.

Next morning we started at 4.30 without breakfast, as, according to the map, Cold Lake, for which we were striking, was only a few miles distant; but the man who made that map or arranged its scale would have fared ill if he had fallen into the hands of our hungry pack when some hours later Cold Lake was not yet reached. The men marched for the most part in Indian file, threading their way over fallen trees and through mossy swamps, while the Chippewyan Indians (formerly enemies, now our scouts and guides) followed in the rear with the pack-ponies. While passing through a clearing there occurred one of those amusing incidents which always seemed to come in the nick of time to relieve the pressure of weariness and restore the equilibrium of the men. An Indian pony behind took fright at a tea-kettle which fell off his back, and which, being tied, as everything on a pack-horse is, kept hitting him on the heels. The pony, after having first kicked vigorously without being able to break the tough "shagganappi" line, finally came tearing along our column like a hurricane, upsetting a captain who had done his best to get out of the way, and then bowling over a color-sergeant, who was taken wholly by surprise. The sergeant, who was a middle-aged and grizzled man, wore his hair very long and very thick, the military crop not being insisted on during prairie campaigning, and he was, moreover, a man of great dignity, polite address, independent opinions and high-toned bearing. He was not seriously hurt by the cavalry onslaught, but in taking his involuntary somersault the pack which he carried on his back was thrown over his head, to the serious detriment of his toilet, and I can still hear the roar of laughter that made the woods ring as the wild tangles of his hair appeared above the long grass, his face wearing the appearance of a man caught in a cyclone.

On we plodded, hungry and weary, through the forest, and at length arrived at the lake, which we had almost begun to think was, like the enemy, retiring before us. We hailed with joy the sparkle of water through the trees, and as we neared it the grand repose and the vastness of this lake, so far remote from the haunts of men, struck us with a feeling akin to awe. It stretches away far almost as the eye can reach, the water pure, clear, cold and deeply blue; the beach, stone, gravel and sand, the latter resembling small diamonds; the woods by the shore grand, umbrageous, reflected in the glassy surface. In the stillness of that sunny June day the lake lay before us like some gigantic and marvellous mirror, reflecting the glorious beauty of its Creator's works.

All day long the men were kept busy building willow huts in the woods, as we were to remain here for some time to scout and explore in the surrounding country. I felt, as doubtless did many others, amply repaid for many a weary march by coming to this lovely spot. The evening came down in quiet splendor, the lake lying peaceful and miraged over with the golden, dusky haze of the sunset coolness. Everything seemed as hushed and still as the holy calm of a Sabbath. It was as though conscious Nature, which had shuddered at the deeds of bloodshed and crime enacted on her bosom, was thus prophetically manifesting forth their speedy close and exhibiting in sublime silence the tranquilizing power of that Gospel whose spread in those lonely wilds will put an end to all savagery and woe—that Gospel whose heralding still rings to us across the centuries, “Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, good-will toward men.”

On the 20th of June Indian scouts from our column found the portion of the band that held the McLeans and other prisoners, and on the 23rd, word being conveyed to them to bring these prisoners in, they were sent in all safe and sound to Fort Pitt, being met on the way by Major Bedson and a detachment of the 90th. We now felt that our campaign was practically over, and that we could return with the consciousness of having at least tried to do our duty. We received orders to return to the brigade, our hundred having penetrated farther than any armed force of that time, and accordingly marched back to the Beaver River. There we found that our boat party had completed a large boat, made without a nail and capable of carrying some sixty men. The patriotic souls of the boys had found vent in the launching, for with some compound of axle-grease they had "writ large" across the side the name of their birth-place, the old historic name of Kildonan. There on the Beaver River the 'Kildonan' was left, and there for aught I know it may still remain, a souvenir for the Chippewyan Indians of the sudden and unsolicited visit of the white soldiers to their far-distant fastnesses.

We rejoined our regiment and marched toward the Frog Lake landing of the Saskatchewan, reaching there about midnight, and amidst falling rain crowded aboard the steamer, which passed down the swift-rushing stream to Fort Pitt, where we were warmly welcomed by the 90th of Winnipeg, the Grenadiers of Toronto, and the Midland Battalion. There we ascertained that our regiment, partly for lack of transport, though principally to gather in the outlaw Indians, was to remain behind for a time, but some fifty of us (the campaign being over) got leave of absence, and on the 4th of July, in company with the 65th, the 90th, the Grenadiers and the Midland Battalion, left Fort Pitt for home in three steamers, the Marquis, the Northwest and the Baroness. That day Col. Williams, of the Midland Battalion, who was in the forefront of the charge at Batoche, died on board the steamer Northwest, and a private of the 65th, who had been wounded at Frenchman's Butte, died on board the Baroness. Only a few days before this I had met Col. Williams at Fort Pitt, being introduced to him by Capt. Hugh John Macdonald, and was much impressed with his manly appearance and soldierly bearing. He took some kind of fever, and, the facilities for nursing not being of the best, he went down under it with startling suddenness.

The next day we landed at Battleford, a picturesque though somewhat straggling town on high upland near the river, and at this point we were joined by the Queen's Own Rifles and Ottawa Foot Guards, with the Quebec Battery. Preparations were here made for the funeral of

LIEUT.-COLONEL WILLIAMS.

Col. Williams, whose body was to be sent home overland. It was one of the most impressively affecting and imposing sights I had ever witnessed. The plain board coffin, wrapped in the folds of the old flag under whose shadow he had fought so honorably and well, was lifted on a gun-carriage, behind which a soldier led his riderless horse. His own fine regiment, now going home without a leader, followed as chief mourners, with arms reversed, and the cortége numbered fully fifteen hundred armed men. Brass bands were there with muffled drums, and the wild lonely upland echoed the wail of the "Dead March in Saul," as slowly and sadly we conducted the gallant dead to the once beleaguered fort, where within the stockaded inclosure the Revs. D. M. Gordon and Whitecombe held a most impressive service. Many a stern soldier who had stood unmoved amidst dangers gave way to his feelings, many a stalwart form heaved with emotion, and on many a sun-bronzed cheek the tear was seen as we consigned to his last journey one of the heroes in the charge that crushed the centre of rebellion, a man who had passed gloriously through the battle, and who, with a name that will live enshrined in the memory of his country, was returning to his home where loved ones looked for his coming, but had fallen here so suddenly before the grim King of Terrors. Escaping the shot that had ploughed the ranks, he, by a death reached through the gateway of duty, had passed into the unseen, and had added his name to the bead-roll of the slain whose lives were yielded up in sacrifice on the altar of their country.

“The muffled drum’s sad roll has beat
Our soldier’s last tattoo,
No more on life’s parade shall meet
That brave and fallen few.
On Fame’s eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.
Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead,
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footstep here shall tread
The herbage of your grave!
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While Fame her record keeps,
Or Honor points the hallowed spot

The solemn service over, we boarded our steamers again and moved down the broad stream, passing the ashes of Fort Carlton (burned just after the Duck Lake fight), and stopping a few hours at Prince Albert. Here we saw the place where the people had garrisoned themselves, and also the place where our active enemy, Big Bear, who had been captured a few days before, was held in durance.* There, too,

* The old chief after the Loon Lake affair had separated from the band with one companion, and being found by the Mounted Police near the site of Fort Carlton, was taken to Prince Albert. Personally he was rather a harmless old man, and but for two of his band, Wandering Spirit and Little Poplar, would never have been found on the war-path.

we met many old friends of former days, and as our bands enlivened the day with music and uniforms were everywhere, the scene was a brilliant one, broken only by the sadness all felt as here and there we saw emblems of mourning worn for the gallant men who from that place had volunteered to maintain the law and had laid their bodies on the fatal field of Duck Lake. In the afternoon we swung out from our moorings and moved down the river, the bands playing "Auld Lang Syne" amidst the cheering of our men, returned by the waving of innumerable handkerchiefs in the hands of ladies fair. We made a swift run to the Forks, where the north and south branches of the Saskatchewan unite in one gigantic stream, and at this point we found the hospital barge with the wounded from Fish Creek and Batoche. The barge, from which the wounded were then transferred to one of the steamers, was a model of cleanliness and comfort, a great credit to the medical staff and to Nurse Miller, the "Florence Nightingale" of the rebellion time. The trip thence was uneventful (save for a storm on Cedar Lake, which nearly swamped our river boats), and as we came down the broad bosom of the magnificent stream we enjoyed the rest, the meeting with old friends and the telling one another of "the dangers we had passed," and the story of "how fields were won."

At Grand Rapids, where a horse tramway connects the river with Lake Winnipeg, we left our boats and, passing over to the lake, packed into every corner of the boats and barges there, and reached Selkirk in the early morning of July 15th. There we found many friends awaiting us, and these, notwithstanding our bronzed and bearded faces, recognized us without difficulty and bade us a hearty welcome. After a lunch, provided by the citizens, we boarded our train and reached Winnipeg in the afternoon, exactly three months from the time our regiment had departed for the west.

A magnificent reception awaited the returning troops. The train seemed to push its way through a living mass of men, women and children at the station, and it had scarcely stopped when the cars were besieged by such a throng that the disembarking soldiers could scarcely find room enough to form up. But at length the lines got into some semblance of order, with "Fours, right, quick march" we swung out to Main Street, and as we passed up towards the City Hall beneath arches and banners, and amidst the intense enthusiasm of cheering crowds we saw the genuineness of the welcome and felt amply repaid for all the hardships and dangers of the campaign.

Our own regiment, the Winnipeg Light Infantry, arrived a few weeks later, being the last to leave the field, after receiving the surrender of enemies to five times their own number, amongst them some of the worst Indians in the West, several of whom came under capital sentence at the hands of the country. The regiment had a fitting reception accorded it by the city of Winnipeg, where the equal readiness with which these volunteers had marched through swamps or fought the enemy, as called upon, was duly appreciated, and when No. 1 Company marched down to their former barracks at Kildonan, we were received with Highland hospitality by the kind friends whose goodness had cheered us on the weary campaign, and whose kindness will long be remembered by the boys who went to the front.

The scars left by the rebellion are slowly disappearing, and little else remains but the memory of the manner in which a young nation showed itself ready and able to cope with serious difficulties within her borders. That memory is enough to effectually prevent any such unfortunate movement ever again taking place and, perhaps in view of the fact that the pressure of difficulties compacts and solidifies character, it was well that before sweeping out into the great possibilities that lie before this once "Great Lone Land," it had to pass through such wrestlings as produce a strength never reached on the dead-level of uninterrupted ease.

After the six years that have passed since the first issue of this book, it may be well to add a note here in regard to the political changes that have taken place meanwhile. We alluded to the defeat of the Conservative party in Manitoba in 1889, and to the famous Schools Act introduced and passed in 1890 by Attorney-General Joseph Martin, a member of the Greenway administration. This administration held office a little over ten years, when the Conservatives rallied their forces under the leadership of the popular Hugh John Macdonald. Mr. Macdonald came into power upon a prohibition pledge and redeemed it by passing the noted Liquor Act through the legislature and submitting it for the opinion of the Imperial Privy Council. It was held to be intra vires of the Provincial Legislature, and it is generally believed that Mr. Macdonald, had he remained in office, would have brought it into force by Order-in-Council; but he had in the meantime dropped out of provincial politics to accept the office of Minister of the Interior. His successor, Hon. R. P. Roblin, and colleagues took the course of asking the people to vote on the enforcement of the Act. This course incensed the temperance people, who largely refrained from voting, and the Act was killed. The Roblin government defend their action by saying that the former votes favoring prohibition had been on the abstract question and that they were not prepared to put a concrete Act in force without a popular mandate. This government has since been returned to power for a second term and has recently abolished saloons and raised the price of other licenses. The public men of that earlier era have given place to others. Mr. Macdonald, though earnestly requested, has refused to re-enter public life. Mr. Greenway and Mr. Sifton are in the Dominion House, and Mr. Martin, the author of the Schools Act of 1890, is practising law on the Pacific Coast, where he is active and prominent in political life. The Hon. D. H. McMillan, another member of the Greenway government, is the present Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and has been knighted for his public services.

In the North-West Territories, Mr. F. W. G. Haultain is still premier, though changes consequent on the formation of these territories into provinces are imminent. One of his ablest colleagues, Mr. James H. Ross, held the governorship of the Yukon for a term, where, as in the Territories, he did splendid service. He is now a member of the Senate. In Manitoba and the Territories alike the immense prosperity of recent years has made the work of all governments much easier than it was in the struggling period of the formative times.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FARTHER WEST.

SINCE the first edition of this book was issued, six years ago, there has been a tremendous movement in the whole Western country. We had then to record that only one considerable railway traversed the land, but the Mackenzie & Mann and the Grand Trunk Pacific systems are now making their way to the far-distant ocean by the setting sun. These great lines, with the original giant Canadian Pacific, are throwing out their branches in all directions and are finding their capacity fully taxed to meet the requirements of the settlers. Immigration during these later years has come in like a flood. For years we were so anxious for settlers that special inducements were held out to Mennonites, Galicians, Icelanders, Doukhobors and others of that ilk from Europe. Some of these have proven themselves valuable, others in the course of time, with patient training, will become desirable citizens; but recently much of the best blood and brain of the British Isles, the Eastern Provinces and the United States, has steadfastly set itself to come to our West land. So pronounced has been the tide from the Republic to the south of us that it has been described as an "American invasion." Sixty thousand of these people are coming in this year (1905). The country is being rapidly settled and the great silences of the prairies which we once knew are vanishing before the clatter and roar of modern life. Cities have sprung into sudden and world-wide prominence. Winnipeg is on the way to be a second Chicago in business activity. Calgary, away at the foothills, referred to on a former page as a child of commercial prophecy, is fulfilling its destiny wonderfully. The immense ranching areas tributary to it are forcing Calgary into metropolitan proportions, while the gigantic scheme of irrigation lately inaugurated is likely to revolutionize the history of the once somewhat arid wastes to the East. Down towards the boundary line recent colonies, like that at Raymond, are introducing new industries, and the "Foothill Country" is the great ranching district of the world. Northward from Calgary, whence some of us walked 210 miles to Edmonton as the first stage of march, in 1885, the railway now traverses the plain, no longer desolate as then, but teeming with the life of new centres of population. Mixed farming thrives all through the region of which Edmonton is the centre, and that once lonely Hudson's Bay Company's post has become a city on the transcontinental railways that are hastening on to supply the mighty river basins and pierce the great mountains to the westward. Down the Saskatchewan from Edmonton we shall meet these steel roadways after they have touched such thriving towns as Prince Albert, Battleford, and others on their path. We have seen these plains when they were broken only by the smoke of the wigwam and the dust-cloud of the buffalo herd. The change is marvellous in our eyes, and we feel it to be only the beginning of larger things, for there is manifestly a mighty nation in the making. Cities will dot these wide plains in all directions and millions of people will dwell here in peace and plenty. A tremendous responsibility rests upon the men at work on the foundations of empire. Both church and state are on trial in this crisis time. God give us great statesmen in these separate spheres.

Up to this year of grace 1905 these vast territories, without provincial status, were governed, as already stated, by a central legislature convening at Regina. Political parties, as such, have not played a prominent part in the general conduct of affairs ; but that period of comparative quiet is nearing its end, since clothed now in the full habiliments of provinces, these territorial districts will enter the arena of political gladiatorship. For some years past the territories have been seeking entry into full status of Confederation as part of the sisterhood from ocean to ocean. In this year the Dominion Parliament has divided these vast districts into two provinces, Alberta and Saskatchewan, with capitals meantime at Edmonton and Regina respectively. The new provinces are shorn of their public lands and given a liberal cash payment in lieu thereof, and the educational system in vogue since 1875 is continued in perpetuity. This last condition is being resented by the new provinces as an invasion of their constitutional rights, and may prove to be a fruitful source of trouble and discord in the future. Barring this untoward incident the outlook is roseate for these gigantic young provinces.

In writing this somewhat general notice of the recent developments in the Territories it is proper that some special reference should be made to the splendid service done by the North-West Mounted Police. This force has become noted for the high quality and trustworthiness, as well as for the courage and devotion to duty, manifested by officers and men. During the recent years, when all kinds of people have been rushing into the country, the duties of the police have been even more exacting than in the early days, when these "Riders of the Plains" won the admiration of the authorities on both sides of the boundary line; but they have all throughout borne themselves so splendidly that the uniform of "scarlet and gold" has become a terror to evildoers and a praise to them that do well. This force has policed not only the great plains, but the gold-fields of the north and the great reaches towards the Arctic circle, as well as the mountain districts of British Columbia. The present commanding officer is Major A. B. Perry, who has oversight of the whole body. He is a thorough-going soldier, of splendid physique, and has been connected with the police for twenty-four years. During this period he has served in all parts of the West, including special duty in the 1885 rebellion, and also commanded the picked detachment at the Queen's Diamond Jubilee. Those who know Major Perry's many qualifications feel assured that the force will fully maintain its great record under his command, and as the preservation of order is of immense importance in the formative stages of a country's history, the Mounted Police should get due credit for their share in the making of the West.

But we must not forget that beyond these provinces there is a further and in some respects a richer West, namely, the splendid Province of British Columbia. Having been bloodlessly landed in Confederation, and having had the good sense to settle her school question in the right way, this "farthest west" of the provinces has not been so much to the front as the others in public discussion or political agitation; but she has been steadily advancing, and being possessed of a climate unrivalled in the Dominion and of resources that have hardly been touched, British Columbia bids fair to be one of the most populous and prosperous of all the provinces. Of the climate it is unnecessary to speak at length. It is, on the whole, superb. On the coast the grass is green and flowers bloom practically all the year round, while in the dry crisp valleys of the interior pulmonary troubles are almost unknown. The scenery is the finest on the continent, whether one considers the majestic splendor of the mountains or the entrancing beauty of the coast cities fringed by the Pacific tide. The resources of the province are wonderful in their extent and variety. The salmon are famed the world over, and immense canneries are found all along the coasts and inlets. The lumber and shingle industries are unequalled. The tremendous squared timbers, requiring three flat cars for carriage, are known far and wide as "British Columbia tooth-picks." The mineral wealth of the country encompasses almost every known product in its extent, and is practically awaiting development. The province has been mistakenly supposed to be non-agricultural, but the river bottoms and the amazingly fertile valleys like the Okanagan are rich in grain and almost every variety of fruit. Valleys hitherto unknown are being explored and new areas suitable for ranching and mixed farming are being discovered. The seaports face the Orient, and when three trans-continental railways reach the coast the cities there will become immense emporiums of trade. With her splendid climate and her astonishing resources British Columbia is a province with a great future.

Her past is brilliant with romance and illumined by the splendid achievements of her early explorers and pioneers. The record stands that Captain Cook who landed in 1778 at a point on Vancouver Island which he called Nootka, was the first actual discoverer of our western coast. Captains Hanna, Meares and Vancouver, all coming around Cape Horn, visited the island at different intervals from that date till 1792, the latter being the year when Captain Vancouver was an important factor in having the title to the coast from California to Alaska settled by arbitration between Spain and Great Britain and turned over to the latter power.

Meanwhile one of the most daring, brilliant and illustriously successful of all explorers was step by step making his perilous way overland from Montreal to the Pacific Coast. This was Alexander Mackenzie, a native of Stornoway, Scotland, who, coming to Canada about 1780, had become a partner in the famous North-West Fur Company, the great rival of the Hudson's Bay Company until the amalgamation of the two in 1821. Mackenzie was a man of singularly noble character, invincible will, and withal capable of undergoing untold hardships. He had found his way in the course of trade to Fort Chippewayan, at Lake Athabasca, and from that point explored the great river which bears his name. After a trip to Montreal and then to England for counsel and information, he resolved to cross to the Pacific over the mountains. His journal is replete with moving incidents by flood and field, so that one is not surprised to know it was a favorite book with Napoleon in his St. Helena exile. Mackenzie left Fort Chippewayan on October 10th, 1792, and after immense exertion reached the Pacific shore on the 20th July, 1793. Three or four days later, after having made careful observations and after being more than once at the point of death at the hands of the Indians, Mackenzie and his companions left on the return journey, having first inscribed on the face of a rock the words: "Alexander Mackenzie, from Canada, by land, the twenty-second of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three." This intrepid explorer, who was knighted by George III. for his splendid services, died in Scotland in 1820. Never was knighthood bestowed more worthily. Mackenzie had settled the "North-West passage" problem, had opened a new world to commerce and had been the forerunner in securing the Pacific mainland as part of the British Empire.

Following these daring movements by sea and land, the Hudson's Bay and North-West Fur Companies pressed on their explorations and established their posts here and there in New Caledonia, as the new territory was called by the indomitable Scots who did the work. John Jacob Astor, of New York, established the Pacific Fur Company at Fort Astoria; but this aggregation was practically driven out by the intensely active "North-Westerns." Meanwhile the activity of explorers was remarkable, and men like Simon Fraser and David Thompson, whose names are commemorated on the great rivers; David Douglas, the scientist, after whom the famous Douglas fir is named, and Robert Campbell, who discovered the Yukon, opened the great country to the world. Magnificent, lordly men were these and their companions, giving their lives amid endless toil to win more for the human family.

But the fur-trading era was coming to a close. In 1843 Fort Camosun (now Victoria) was built on Vancouver Island. This became the Hudson's Bay Company's headquarters on the coast, and efforts were made to promote settlement. In 1849 Vancouver Island became a Crown colony, with Richard Blanshard as governor, succeeded a year later by the famous James Douglas. The year 1856 saw representative government established on Vancouver Island. The settlers, who were growing in numbers, began to ask for a share in the task of governing themselves, and in February, 1856, Governor Douglas received instructions from the Home Government to call his Council and arrange for a popular election. Accordingly the governor, assisted by the Council, composed of John Tod, James Cooper, Roderick Finlayson and John Grant, divided the island into four electoral districts—Victoria, Esquimalt, Nanaimo and Sooke. There were very few electors in some of the districts, but the formalities were all complied with and a legislature elected. The names of these pioneer legislators were as follows:—

Victoria.—J. D. Pemberton, Joseph Yates, and E. E. Langford. Mr. Langford had not the necessary property qualification, and Mr. J. W. Mackay was elected in his stead. The others were elected by acclamation.

Sooke.—John Muir.

Nanaimo.—John F. Kennedy.

Esquimalt.—Dr. J. S. Helmcken and Thomas Skinner.

The first Assembly convened in August, 1856, and Dr. J. S. Helmcken was elected Speaker. During these years the discovery of gold on the Fraser River, and the general attractiveness of the country, had drawn many settlers to the mainland, which was constituted a separate colony, though added to the jurisdiction of Governor Douglas. Settlement grew apace in this mainland colony of British Columbia, as it was called; great wagon roads were constructed into the Cariboo mines and other parts; centres like New Westminster, Langley, Yale and Hope, on the Fraser River, became important, and discussion looking to a union of the two colonies became general. This was finally consummated by order of the Imperial Government in 1866. New Westminster was the capital of the mainland colony, and remained the chief seat of authority until 1868, when Victoria was proclaimed the capital of the whole country, as it remains to this day. Victoria is one of the most beautiful cities in the world and an almost ideal place of residence, but there are some who say that only for the erection of the magnificent legislative buildings there in 1893 the capital would again shift to the more populous mainland.

We are now approaching the Confederation period in the history of British Columbia, but we cannot leave the study of the Crown colony era without paying tribute to the ability and courage of the men who directed the fortunes of the country during those early and often troublous times. Many names come up to the mind from the public life of that time—names that are worthy of great honor, but all these cannot be referred to in a short history. Two names at once claim attention. The one is that of James Douglas, Governor of Vancouver Island from 1851, then of both colonies, and, on to the end of his term in 1864, of the mainland colony of British Columbia. He was at the same time a chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and connected with one or two other commercial organizations; but notwithstanding his connection with these varied interests he exercised the office of governor with splendid ability, great dignity, and singular tact. His position conduced to autocracy, and certain sections of the community at times resented the strength of his iron hand; but it is difficult to conceive how any man could have done the country better service. Boundary disputes, rushes into the gold diggings, mixed population problems, and the unrest always characteristic of new countries, all threw their quota into making his tenure of office difficult and delicate; but his unstained personal character made him proof against calumny. On his leaving Victoria at the close of his term of office, the British Colonist editorially said: "If we have at times opposed the measures of the government, we have never in our discussion of the public acts of the executive head of that government failed in our esteem for the sterling honesty of purpose which guided those acts, nor for the manly and noble qualities and virtues which adorn the man." At a brilliant farewell banquet in the same city the chairman said: "The governor during these formative years had to do everything; he had to organize, reorganize and create. His administration had been one alive to the interests of all and deaf to the clamor and vilification of interested parties." When he closed his term of office on the mainland a banquet was given in his honor in New Westminster. Addresses were presented by the Legislative Council, government officials, and by nine hundred residents from different points in the colony, all speaking in the most glowing manner of the way in which he had done his duty. A sentence in his reply is characteristic of his loftiness of sentiment: "A pyramid of gold and gems would have been less acceptable to me than this simple record. I ask for no prouder monument and for no other memorial when I die and go hence than the testimony here offered that I have done my duty." A right worthy Douglas, an incorruptible statesman, a pattern for men in public and private life!

The other name that stands out in the transition period is that of Judge Begbie, of the Vancouver Island colony, afterwards Sir Matthew Baillie Begbie, Chief Justice of the United Colonies and the Province of British Columbia. I was in Victoria at the time of his public funeral in June, 1894, and was struck by the overwhelming evidences of the esteem in which he had been held by the country. Nothing could be more fitting than such a tribute. Begbie was born in Edinburgh and educated at Cambridge. He practised sixteen years in the Old Land and then was appointed Judge of the Court in the Vancouver Island colony. From that date he was the head and front of the judicial administration of the country till his death in 1894. The services he rendered to the new country during those critical years of indiscriminate immigration, frontier restlessness and gold mine excitement consisted in the profound impression he created as to the fearlessness, impartiality and dignity of a British Court of Justice. Adventurers who rushed into the country from excessively democratic surroundings and had the habit of being familiar and jocular with men on the Bench were awed by the courtly bearing and dignified manner of the British judge, who had, withal, a keen intellect and an iron will. His name became a synonym for swift, unerring, fearless and even-handed justice to such an extent that British Columbia, contrary to every experience of countries similarly situated, has always been singularly free from crime. Great mining camps in the interior, in which were hundreds of sometimes rough and lawless men from many lands, had such a wholesome sense of British law as administered by this upright judge that one constable was often sufficient to preserve order.

The same general condition of things has always prevailed in the North-West Territories, where the excellence of the courts, seconded by the magnificent courage and energy of the Mounted Police, has made crime comparatively rare. There is a splendid lesson here. There is such a thing as becoming too democratic. There is a value in the ermined robe and the uniform that should not be overlooked, because the free and easy judicial methods of some countries have been conspicuously and historically injurious wherever they prevailed. All honor to the memory of the judge, properly and deservedly knighted by his Queen for his noble services in the far-flung borders of her Empire.

But in our survey of the Pacific Coast country we have now come to the Confederation period. The statesmen who brought the four original provinces together in 1867 were too far-seeing to omit from their vision the possibility of a Dominion from ocean to ocean. British statesmen and papers began to discuss the idea, but many saw the difficulty of uniting the extreme points of the projected confederation by railway communication. In 1868 the Dominion Government asked the Home Government to get the British Columbia authorities to move in the matter. The said authorities were slow, if not somewhat hostile, and the people acted with characteristic Western vigor. On July 1st, 1868, a big open-air meeting was held at Barkerville, in the Cariboo, where some "hot" speeches were made and motions were passed in favor of confederation. In September of the same year a huge convention was held at Yale, where the people avowed their discontent with existing conditions and advocated confederation on certain terms. The document drawn up by Messrs. DeCosmos, Robson, Barnard, Babbitt, McMillan, Thompson and Havelock, was a very able presentation of the case, yet the Legislative Council refused to take action; but in 1869 the Governor-General instructed Governor Musgrave, at Victoria, to do all he could to press the matter. Accordingly the governor and his advisers prepared terms of union and submitted them to the Legislature in 1870. Then came a great debate on the subject. It was a struggle of giants and every clause was discussed with immense energy and ability. When they were finally passed Messrs. Helmcken, Trutch and Barnard were chosen to negotiate with the Dominion Government. On July 7th, 1870, the terms were agreed on at Ottawa and the decision wired to Victoria. Mr. Trutch went on to England to arrange for the necessary Imperial legislation, and the Imperial Government endorsed the Dominion Government's guarantee as to the railway within ten years. The first Legislative Assembly of British Columbia under Confederation met in February, 1872, and consisted of the following twenty-five members:—

John F. McCreight, Simeon Duck, Robert Beaven and James Trimble, for Victoria City; A. DeCosmos and Arthur Bunster, for Victoria District; Alexander R. Robertson and Henry Cogan, for Esquimalt; William Smith and John Paton Booth, for Cowichan; John Robson, for Nanaimo; John Ash, for Comox; Henry Holbrook, for New Westminster City; J. C. Hughes and W. J. Armstrong, for New Westminster District; Robert Smith, James Robinson and Charles A. Semlin, for Yale; A. T. Jamieson and T. B. Humphreys, for Lillooet; G. A. Walkem, Joseph Hunter and Cornelius Booth, for Cariboo; John A. Mara and Charles Todd, for Kootenay. In the opening speech Governor Trutch congratulated the province on having entered Confederation, and showed what a gain would result from having the country free of debt and from securing the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Then came the long delay in railway construction and the consequent dissatisfaction in British Columbia. Attorney-General Walkem went to England to petition the Home Government in view of the "breach of terms" by the Dominion. Walkem met Lord Carnarvon, Secretary of State for the Colonies, and as a result the latter wired Lord Dufferin, then Governor-General, the famous "Carnarvon terms," which action was satisfactory in the meantime to British Columbia. Then came more delay in beginning the mountain section of the railway, and the people of British Columbia became bitter and some threatened secession. Lord Dufferin visited the province about this time and refused to go under an arch in Victoria inscribed with the words "Carnarvon terms or separation." This angered some, but on the whole the visit of the great diplomat did much to alleviate the agitated situation.

But all delays were finally overcome, a new C. P. R. syndicate took hold, the Burrard Inlet route was adopted, construction was rushed from both ends, and the last spike was driven in the great transcontinental line by Hon. Donald A. Smith (now Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal) in September, 1885, at Craigellachie. The group photograph of this scene, with Mr. Smith, Van Horne, and the famous engineer, Sandford Fleming, in the foreground, shows one of the greatest historical situations and events in Canadian history.

Since that time the progress of the province has been steady, though hampered somewhat by misunderstandings between labor and capital in the mining districts. Vancouver, which had practically no existence beyond a few shacks when the last spike in the C. P. R. was driven, has become the most populous and progressive city of the province. It has unique advantages. It is beautiful for situation. Moated by the sea and guarded by the towering mountains, it has unusual scenic splendors. Stanley Park, with its eight-mile drive, has no equal in Canada. The water supply is perfect and the drainage is all that could be desired. The health of the city is unrivalled and its general progress wonderful. Its commercial pre-eminence in British Columbia is assured.

New Westminster is prosperous, though overshadowed by the new terminal city of Vancouver. Ambitious cities and towns have grown up in the interior, such as Revelstoke, Kamloops, Rossland, Nelson and Vernon, each representing extensive business relations.

THE

DRIVING THE LAST SPIKE IN THE C.P.R.

The province is no longer dependent on one railway. The Great Northern, crossing a magnificent bridge over the Fraser at New Westminster, runs into the city of Vancouver, and doubtless will extend along the coast toward the gold and timber of the north. The Kootenay Valley is in close touch by rail with the States to the south, and a Coast-Kootenay railway is projected. The trade with the Orient is growing immensely, and increased railway facilities will bring the province into closer touch with the prairies east of the Rockies.

Population has not grown rapidly, but the superior climate will draw increasingly from the older parts of Canada. Much of the prosperity on the coast is due to the great trade done with the northern gold-fields of the Yukon country, into which thousands went with the famous rush of 1898. There a large population has gathered in the hunt for gold, and Dawson City, the capital, though but a few years old, has all the accessories of a metropolitan centre. New mining fields are being discovered, and the general opinion now is that the Yukon is a permanent rather than a transitory territory.

The political life of British Columbia has been marked by much restlessness and a good many upheavals. This is partly due to the fact of a certain jealousy existing between the island and the mainland, and also, it is believed, to the absence of any party line in politics, and the presence of the private clique in consequence. This latter trouble, if it be such, is now being remedied. The last local election was conducted on party lines, with the result that the Conservatives, under Hon. Richard McBride, were elected by a narrow majority. The Province of British Columbia has poured wealth into the Dominion treasury out of all proportion in excess of what she has received, and the time seems ripe for some readjustment.

The destinies of the Yukon are guided by a commissioner appointed by the Dominion Government, who is assisted by an elected council, and the territory also has a member in the Dominion Parliament.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway project is already helping the province, and, stirred by a rival, the Canadian Pacific has acquired the Dunsmuir railways on Vancouver Island and is erecting a magnificent tourist hotel in Victoria.

On the whole, the outlook for British Columbia is full of hope, and her sanguine-tempered people are seeing already the fruition of their long-cherished ambitions.

CHAPTER XIII.

RELIGIOUS DEVELOPMENT.

HISTORY registers approval of the old Hebrew prophet who said that the nation or kingdom which will not serve God shall perish. The world is a great burying-ground of the peoples who have, through their disobedience of Divine law, been compelled to bite the dust. Their high places are desolate; their towers of pride are levelled prone to the earth. Some of them reached an extraordinary height of literary and scientific culture; some of them swept the seas with conquering galleys, and others sent their trampling legions forth to subdue the world. Some attained to wonderful commercial greatness and others to unprecedented wealth; but nothing ever availed to keep alive the nation or people that despised the fiat of the Almighty. How is it with regard to our new empire in the West? Concerning the past we may speak with considerable confidence. The land has borne the distinct stamp of religion, partly because of the character of the early colonists and partly because the churches have been wisely led in their efforts to keep abreast of the tide of immigration. The continuance of an aggressive Home Mission policy is one of the first duties of all the Canadian churches.

The first colonists in the Red River country were the Selkirk settlers, and these, being Presbyterians, maintained services amongst themselves as early as 1813; but notwithstanding the promises made to them on leaving Scotland, these people had to wait many years for a minister of their own denomination. In the meantime an elder amongst them, James Sutherland, was authorized by the church to baptize and marry, but no settled congregational work could be undertaken. The Scotch settlers, while maintaining their own meetings, attended on Sundays the services of the Anglican Church, which, in the person of Rev. John West, began work on the Red River in 1820. This whole history of mutual concession and co-operation on the part of the Anglican Church and the Presbyterian settlers is highly creditable to both. They were all manifestly in earnest about the maintenance of religious ordinances in the country, and without emphasizing their differences in creed or polity preferred to do all in their power that the institutions of Christian civilization should be firmly established in the new land.

Following the early French explorers the Roman Catholic Church sent two priests, Fathers Provencher and Dumoulin, to the Red River in 1818. These shortly afterwards began settled work on the east side of the Red River, opposite the mouth of the Assiniboine, and their parish was called later by the name St. Boniface. This has remained ever since that time the centre and seat of the work of that church in the West. Provencher was soon afterwards made Bishop and it was he who built at St. Boniface the cathedral with its "turrets twain," which Whittier immortalized in his beautiful verses entitled "The Red River Voyageur." Provencher's cathedral was burned down, but the "bells of St. Boniface" still continued to ring out their musical chimes from the edifice erected in its place. A young priest, Alex. Taché, of the Oblates Order, who came in 1845 to the West, succeeded Provencher, who died in 1853. Bishop Taché ultimately became archbishop over the whole Church in the country. He was a man of gentle, lovable disposition and had unbounded influence over his own people. Essentially and by disposition a man of peace, he had great force of will and energy in following plans he considered in the interests of the work over which he presided. By the "irony of fate" he, the man of peace, lived through the stormy period of rebellious and educational discussions; but the old settlers who knew him best, Protestant as well as Roman Catholic, always held him in high esteem for his unblemished character and the simple saintliness of his personal life.

During these years the Roman Catholic Church was sending out its missionaries amongst the native aboriginal tribes of the west and north, and their self-sacrificing devotion to work was admirable. Some of these missionaries acquired great influence over the Indians, and men like Father Lacombe have done splendid service to the country in exerting their power for peace when the spirit of mutiny was abroad. The church has extended widely over the whole country and manifests great vigor in carrying its work to the remotest points. The present archbishop at St. Boniface is Langevin, who, though less irenic than his predecessor, is proving himself a skilful and able administrator of the affairs of his diocese.

We have already referred to the Church of England beginning work on the Red River in 1820 under the Rev. John West, who built a church and school at St. John's. In 1824 he was joined by the Rev. William Cochrane, who opened parishes farther down the river, at St. Paul's and St. Andrew's, and still later at St. Peter's, near Lake Winnipeg. His labors were unceasing and he deserves special place in the enumeration of forces for good in the early days. The church began speedily to extend its work to other points, men like McCallum and Cowley being amongst the early workers in the school and mission field. In 1844 the Bishop of Montreal visited the Red River country and saw that the work should be carried on with an increased force. Henry Budd, catechist, afterwards ordained, and Archdeacon John Hunter, a noted preacher sent out by the C.M.S., were added to the staff, and in 1849 the diocese of Rupert's Land was established, David Anderson being consecrated its bishop in Canterbury Cathedral. When he arrived in the Red River he established headquarters at St. John's, where the cathedral, opened in 1862, remains to this day. Mr. McCallum died on October, 1849, the day on which Bishop Anderson arrived in the country. The bishop took charge of the "McCallum" school in addition to his other duties, and from this school came men like John Norquay and others who did distinguished service in the West. After doing most important work Bishop Anderson returned to England and resigned in 1864, when he was succeeded by Dr. Robert Machray, a very distinguished Fellow of Sydney College, Cambridge. From that time till his death, in 1903, the labors of Bishop Machray were unceasing, abundant and far-reaching in their results on the history and life of the country. His vast diocese was afterwards subdivided, and those of Saskatchewan, Qu'Appelle, Moosonee, Athabaska, Mackenzie River and Calgary formed out of it. In 1866 the bishop was joined by the Rev. John McLean, who was a very able preacher and who afterwards became the first Bishop of Saskatchewan. The bishop, with Archdeacon McLean and the Rev. S. Pritchard, re-organized the "McCallum-Anderson" school, and made it a great success. Dr. Machray took an active part in the affairs of the country and was one of the factors in the peaceful solution of the Riel troubles in 1870. He afterwards became Archbishop of Rupert's Land, and later Primate of all Canada. He took a leading part in the formation of the University of Manitoba, of which he was chancellor from its beginning till his death. In the course of his years of service the country opened up in all directions and the Church of England nobly did her part in sending missionaries to all parts of the "New West" and as far north as man could live. During the year preceding his death the Rev. S. P. Matheson, who had been practically from his childhood connected with St. John's, was elected coadjutor bishop and has during this year been elected by the House of Bishops to the high office of Archbishop of Rupert's Land. Archbishop Matheson is an Anglican through being adopted at an early age into a family of that Church. He comes of the old Scotch Presbyterian colony on the Red River, where he was born, and two of his brothers are elders in the church of his ancestors. He is one of the very ablest men in the West, a sound administrator, an inspiring preacher, and a loveable, genial man. His popularity is unbounded, and being still in the prime of life he has doubtless much yet to do in moulding the religious and educational life of the country. The largest congregation of this church in the West is Holy Trinity, Winnipeg, of which the Rev. O. Fortin has been the successful and popular pastor for nearly thirty years.

Though the Church of England was from the earliest days active in work amongst the aboriginal tribes of the West, it was not as aggressive in general missionary enterprise as some others. This was partly due to the fact that the church depended a good deal on contributions from England, and also to the fact that the church, being separated into almost independent synods and dioceses, could not engage in a united effort. By degrees the contributions from England became less necessary and then the whole church in Canada united in a General Synod in 1893. It took some years to get things in concerted motion under this arrangement; but in 1902 a very distinct forward movement was made in regard to missions. The Rev. L. Norman Tucker, D.C.L., was called from Christ Church, Vancouver, to be General Secretary for Missions (Home and Foreign), with the special work of raising funds and stirring the church by systematic efforts. Dr. Tucker has many popular gifts and much tact. The wisdom of the church in formulating its new policy and calling him to take general charge has been shown by the fact that missionary contributions have nearly trebled in the last three years.

The Presbyterians, who as colonists were first on the ground, had to wait till 1851 for a minister of their own; then Rev. John Black arrived and found that the people had been so careful to maintain their religious training that three hundred of them were ready to unite in full membership. Mr. (later Dr.) Black was an ideal pioneer, strong physically, morally, mentally, a mighty man in the pulpit, a faithful friend in private life. He was everything to the Scottish colony of Kildonan, and has left his name indelibly stamped on the history of the West. Under his ministry was built the famous stone church, still in service, with its now noted cemetery, where rest the Presbyterian makers of the country. From Kildonan missionary enterprises were undertaken, the most notable being the sending of the Rev. James Nisbet out amongst the Indians of the Saskatchewan. This devoted man founded a mission named Prince Albert, now a thriving city, and became the first of the band now doing great service amongst the native tribes. Rev. John McKay, a native of the plains, and in the early days a noted buffalo hunter, became a most successful missionary, assisting Mr. Nisbet, and a great power for peace amongst the Indians on the Saskatchewan.

The Presbyterian Church has made up for its early dilatoriness in sending a minister to the Selkirk settlers by becoming in these later years the most aggressive and powerful church organization west of Lake Superior. This has been due in part to the fact that the earlier settlers belonged to that body, that Kildonan became a missionary centre, and that the pioneer ministers were intensely active in the work ; but in large measure it is due to the fact that a man of unusual qualifications as a church statesman and organizer, an enthusiast and seer all in one, became the leader of the missionary movement in the West. This man was the Rev. James Robertson, who was called from the pastorate of Knox Church, Winnipeg, to be Superintendent of Missions. He had such immense energy and zeal that he roused others to action, moved church courts and congregations by his Celtic fire till the general forward movements began. The untiring force he threw into the work told at length upon his iron frame and he died in 1902, his body being laid to rest in the old Kildonan churchyard, on the edge of the great Home field to which he had given his life. The Assembly divided the burden of his work amongst three, because the great rush of immigration had begun. Rev. Dr. E. D. McLaren, who had done important service on the Pacific Coast, was made General Secretary of Home Missions; Rev. Dr. Carmichael, of Regina, was appointed Superintendent for Manitoba and part of the Territories, and Rev. Dr. Herdman, of Calgary, for Alberta and British Columbia. Under their guidance the work is going on with great vigor in all parts of the West.

The Methodist Church from about the year 1840 had noted missionaries, such as Rundle and Evans, to the "farther West" and North. Rev. George McDougall, a little later, went out to the foothill country and became an influential element in the new country. His son, Rev. John McDougall, has followed his father in influence and in his zeal for the land of his adoption. It was not till 1869 that the Methodist Church began work on the Red River, by sending thither the Rev. George Young, who is noted as being the founder of the work of his church in Manitoba and as being the spiritual adviser of Thomas Scott when he was shot in 1870 by order of Riel. The church has been exceedingly active during these years and has gone everywhere with its missions over the whole West.

The Baptist Church, though coming late into the field has proved a vigorous force in the life of the West, while the Congregational body has maintained in the larger centres influential individual congregations. The Salvation Army deserves mention for its devoted and far-reaching work amongst the homeless and the helpless of Western cities and towns.

The church life of the North-West Territories is practically the overflow from the older province of Manitoba, and does not need separate treatment. Suffice it to say that the churches are all active, and that the larger towns have edifices devoted to religious and educational work which would reflect credit on metropolitan cities. Such is the vigor of Western life.

The work of the churches in British Columbia grew up separately, and the early missionaries reached their fields either round Cape Horn or by way of the Western Pacific States, hence some special mention of the religious development of that province is required.

The Anglican Church, whose ministers were chaplains to the Hudson's Bay Company, were first on the ground, as we hear of the Rev. H. Beaver at Fort Vancouver in 1836. The Rev. R. J. Staines came to Fort Victoria in 1849, and the Rev. E. Cridge (afterwards Bishop) reached there in 1855. Ever since that time the church has held a very prominent place in the Pacific Province, and has done her full share of work.

The first Roman Catholic priest to begin regular work was Father Demers, in 1847, although Father Bolduc had come to Fort Vancouver in 1843 for a while. This church has given special attention to work among the native tribes, but has very large churches and schools in the principal cities of the province.

The Methodist Church was at work in 1858, the pioneer being Dr. E. Evans, followed immediately by Revs. E. White, Ebenezer Robson and Arthur Browning. The first conference was formed in 1887, with Rev. E. Robson as first president. Mr. Robson is the only survivor of that early band, and for his services received the first degree of D.D. conferred by the College of British Columbia. The Rev. Thomas Crosby, coming to Nanaimo in 1863, organized an Indian school, and afterwards became the most successful missionary to the Indians on the Fraser River, and later at Fort Simpson in the north. At Fort Simpson and other coast points he effected a complete transformation in the lives of the natives and introduced into their communities all the improved conditions of civilization. Several revival waves swept the different districts, and proved of lasting value. The Methodist Church has remained active in all parts of the province, and has specially fine churches in Victoria and Vancouver. The Rev. Dr. Whittington, a particularly able man, has oversight of all the Indian work in British Columbia.

REV. E. ROBSON, D.D.

The first Presbyterian missionary, Rev. John Hall, came to Victoria in 1861, followed in 1862 by Rev. Robert Jamieson. The First Presbyterian Church of Victoria was the pioneer building of that denomination west of the Red River. Later on a number of ministers came from Scotland, the only survivor of whom is the Rev. Alexander Dunn, of Whonnock, who has done faithful service over large districts on the Fraser River. The work of this church is now extended over the whole province, and in 1903 the General Assembly of the Dominion held an eminently successful meeting in Vancouver City. This was the only national church gathering that ever assembled on the coast, and the effect was immediately felt in the increased vitality of Western work.

Other churches have come to British Columbia in more recent years, and on the whole there is widespread and increasing interest in religious work in that province. All the churches conduct missions with considerable success amongst the thousands of Chinese and Japanese on the coast.

The Yukon and other northern districts have not been neglected. Long before there was any suspicion of the richness of the country, Anglican and Roman Catholic missionaries touched the country here and there in their work amongst the native tribes; but the great gold-rush of 1898 brought new responsibilities to the churches. The Presbyterian Church, under the leadership of the superintendent, Dr. Robertson, was especially active. Mr. Dickie, now of Selkirk, Manitoba, went to Skaguay, the headquarters of the rush. Mr. Grant (formerly of Almonte) went in over the trail to Dawson, and still remains at his post there. His work has been of great extent and value. Largely at his own expense he built and operated the Good Samaritan Hospital, where his former studies in medicine stood him in good stead. His own congregation flourished, and now meets in a splendid church edifice equipped with a $10,000 pipe organ. Two brothers, Revs. John and George Pringle, have taken an exceedingly strong place in the work, and the former has been recognized in visits east to our church courts as one of the most noted of our missionaries. Others, like Wright, Russell, Sinclair and Turkington, deserve special mention. Other churches have work in progress in these districts, but the names prominent in connection with the earliest efforts amongst the ingoing miners are those already noticed.

The Canadian West is to-day the greatest Home Mission field on the globe. Up to date the work has been kept abreast of settlement, but with the thousands who are now coming in to the country the resources and energy of all the churches will be fully taxed. On their faithfulness and zeal must depend in large measure the future welfare of the West and, therefore, of the Dominion. They must not shrink from their responsibility. They must hold the ground they have, and win more.

CHAPTER XIV.

EDUCATIONAL HISTORY.

LACK of education is a serious handicap. Men find that if, either through their own neglect or otherwise, they have failed to obtain an education in their earlier years, all the rest of life is affected prejudicially. It is not otherwise with a nation. No people can make the most of the resources of the country or cultivate the higher aims of life unless the educational idea has stood in the forefront of their activities. Here, as in the last chapter, we have reason to be thankful for the history of the West. From the earliest times education received careful consideration, and since the church as such does not receive large credit for good from some directions, it may be well to remind readers that the churches of the West built and maintained the schools and colleges from the outset. This splendid service by the churches made possible the work of later educationists.

Soon after coming to the Red River, in 1820, the Rev. John West, of the Church of England, founded a mission school at St. John's for the Selkirk settlers, and for the children of Hudson's Bay Company employees. This school was greatly improved by the Rev. John McCallum, who was a graduate of Aberdeen. Bishop Anderson further increased the prestige of the institution and practically made it into St. John's College. After Bishop Anderson's time it fell away for a time but was re-organized by Bishop Machray, with Rev. Archdeacon McLean as warden. From that time forward the progress of St. John's College has been steady. A handsome brick building was erected a few years ago and now the institution is about to be moved into the centre of the educational district of Winnipeg, near the University.

The Selkirk settlers made use of the McCallum school for some years, and then started one for themselves in the house of one of the colonists. When their minister, Rev. John Black, came in 1851 he gave the school a great impetus, and sent more than one "lad of pairts" to study abroad. Then the number of those desiring higher education grew to such an extent that the Presbyterian Church founded Manitoba College in 1870 at Kildonan, though the institution was moved to the new centre, at Winnipeg, a few years later. This college also has become a great force in the life of the country. Its early teachers, Drs. Bryce and Hart, have taken an important part in the making of the country. With a view to strengthening the department of theology, the General Assembly appointed Rev. John M. King, D.D., of Toronto, to be principal. Dr. King, who died in 1900, left a distinct impression on the life of the West. He was a born teacher and had great executive ability. Under his administration the college prospered greatly, the buildings were enlarged, and the debt cleared. At his death Rev. Dr. Patrick, of Dundee, Scotland, was appointed principal, and he with those already named, as well as Drs. Baird, Kilpatrick and Perry, with several lecturers, carry on this large and important work.

The Roman Catholic Church, beginning its mission at St. Boniface about 1819, shortly afterwards began a school which has grown into the important college at that point. Amongst its teachers have been many distinguished men, the most prominent in the public eye being Father Drummond, S. J., who is widely known as a learned scholar and accomplished orator. Fathers Cherrier, Cloutier and Hudon were amongst the prominent workers in the college during the last two decades.

The Methodist Church established a college in Winnipeg under the principalship of Rev. Dr. Sparling, who, with Professors Stewart, Bland, Osborne and others, carries on a very important institution. A very handsome building of Calgary stone is the home of this college, which is one of the most active of the forces in the life of the new West.

The Baptists have founded a college at Brandon under Principal McDiarmid, which within recent years has been doing most creditable service.

These colleges, with the Manitoba Medical College, form the University of Manitoba, which is so unique an institution on this continent that it deserves some special notice. Putting it in brief form, the university is constituted by an affiliation in one body of all the denominational colleges, together with the Medical College. It has been managed with such wonderful success and tact that all have worked in harmony, provision being made for different papers in certain subjects and for examinations in French as well as English.

The university was founded in 1877, when the Province of Manitoba was still very young and sparsely settled. The denominational colleges then in existence were St. John's, St. Boniface and Manitoba College—Anglican, Roman Catholic and Presbyterian respectively. The founder was Hon. Alexander Morris, Lieutenant-Governor, who, after consultation with the heads of these colleges, urged the government to bring a Bill before the Legislature. The endowment was only $250 a year, and the college professors, with graduates of other universities in British countries, formed the body of the University, and taught and examined the students sent up from the colleges. A bequest from Mr. A. K. Isbister, of London, England, a retired Hudson's Bay officer, an endowment tract of 150,000 acres of swamp land secured by Hon. John Norquay, together with Provincial Government support, have placed the university in a prosperous condition. It now has a handsome building and three regular professors, apart from those in the several affiliated colleges. Its work has been of immense service in keeping a high standard of education before the people of the "new West."

Higher education in the "farther West" has not been neglected, although there is as yet no university in active work beyond Manitoba. In the Territories there are the High Schools, which we shall speak of later, and colleges at Calgary, Edmonton and Prince Albert. These are due to the activity of the churches, but are not specially denominational. Schools among the Indians, that give instruction in arts and trades, are important additions to the life of the country, and these are under the care of the different churches.

In British Columbia there has been considerable discussion and some legislation as to a university, which has not yet materialized. The school system of the province has affiliation with McGill University, and students can take two years in that university without leaving the province. The collegiate or college in Vancouver, under Principal Shaw, is the most prominent in this work. The Methodists have a college in New Westminster, under Principal Sipprell, doing important service and being affiliated with Toronto University. There is a college for boys at Kamloops, and the various churches have schools amongst the Indians at different places.

We have thus been led to the study of higher education by following the development of the church schools of the early days into colleges and on to the university. We followed this line so as to keep things in this direction distinct and clear. Now we come back to study the elementary or Public School system in the different parts of the West. Here, as we travel, we shall find the route more intricate, and at times we shall pass through storm-belts on the way.

Beginning with Manitoba, we find that previous to Confederation schools existed largely under the care of Anglican, Roman Catholic and Presbyterian churches. These schools were supported by the voluntary subscriptions of the people, supplemented by grants from the Hudson's Bay Company, which recognised the value and necessity of education in the country. In 1871 the first Provincial Legislature passed an Act constituting a Board of Education in two sections, Protestant and Roman Catholic, and making all necessary provision for the maintenance of Separate Schools. This was done, it was said, in pursuance of the fact that the Bill of Rights presented by the people of the Red River to the Dominion Government had asked for the rights as to schools the churches had by law or by practice at the time Manitoba entered Confederation. There were no rights by law, and in the long process of later litigation it was discovered that the original authentic and genuine Bill of Rights had not asked for rights that had been established by practice—the words "by practice" had found their way somehow into the document as the result of an afterthought on the part of some who were interested. In any case the Roman Catholic Church had no rights as to schools "by practice" which were not possessed by the Anglicans and Presbyterians.

It is well known that Mr. John Sutherland, member for Kildonan in the first Manitoba Legislature, made, along with Mr. E. H. G. Hay, of St. Andrews, and others, an effort to prevent the Separate School idea being made law, but the country was primitive and unused to these questions, hence the people made no general movement and the law was passed. It was not long before agitation against the system arose, and in 1876 the Protestant section of the School Board passed a resolution asking for the abolition of the separate system. But beyond some slight amendments the law remained the same until 1890, when Hon. Joseph Martin, Attorney-General in the Greenway administration, introduced and passed an Act abolishing Separate Schools and establishing a non-sectarian system of national Public Schools. This aroused the Roman Catholic leaders, and for six years the question was in the courts, from the first trial judge through all the stages to the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council. Bitter feeling was aroused all over the Dominion, and the Manitoba School Question became a species of public nuisance in that it dwarfed all other matters into forgetfulness. The Privy Council held that the province had a constitutional right to pass the Act of 1890. Then the Roman Catholics appealed for remedial action to the Governor-General-in-Council. Their right to make the appeal was fought out in the courts and decided in the affirmative. Then Sir Charles Tupper and his administration issued, on March 19th, 1895, the famous Remedial Order, practically requiring the Government of Manitoba to restore the school system as it was before the Act of 1890. The Legislature of Manitoba met in June, 1897, and, chiefly under the direction of the Hon. Clifford Sifton, who had succeeded Mr. Martin as Attorney-General, refused to obey the Remedial Order. Sir Charles Tupper stood by his programme to remedy the alleged wrongs of the Roman Catholics. He went to the country on the issue and was overwhelmingly defeated by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party, who stood for provincial rights throughout the contest. Shortly after this an arrangement was arrived at between the Laurier and Greenway-Sifton Government, by which the Act of 1890 was maintained in force, with some very slight amendments, the understanding being that the Act was to be administered in a conciliatory spirit. Ever since that time the school system of Manitoba has been national and unsectarian. It is quite well known that many Roman Catholic parents, realizing the superior advantages of the Public School, have cordially accepted the situation; but the leaders of the church have always declared their opposition to accepting the settlement as a finality, and have encouraged large numbers of their people to maintain their own schools, even at the cost of paying double taxes. The encyclical of the late Pope Leo was somewhat irenic in its tone, since it spoke of the justice of the claims of Roman Catholics and advised continued effort, but practically told them to take what they could get and make the best of it. That the church has not ceased its efforts is evident from the recent amazing action of Mgr. Sbaretti, the Papal Ablegate in Canada, who suggested to Attorney-General Campbell that the Manitoba Government would be more successful in pressing other claims upon the Dominion if they would first of all restore in some measure the old Separate School system in their province. It is safe to predict that Manitoba, having tried both systems, will adhere to the unsectarian Public School as best calculated to serve the highest educational interests of the people and promote homogeneity of life in the country.

HON. CLIFFORD SIFTON.

The progress of education in Manitoba during recent years has been remarkable. The Western people spend lavishly on their school buildings and equipment, so that small villages amongst them have more elaborate edifices than some cities in older parts of the world. The standard for teachers is steadily advancing, and the best class of High Schools, Normal Schools and Collegiates is found in all parts of the province. With this justifiable pride in their educational system the people of Manitoba will likely continue to make rapid progress as in the past.

The history of the educational system of the North-West Territories is more complete in some respects, and as it is now, at the time of the present writing, in the crucible of fierce political discussion it may be well to give a somewhat detailed statement in regard to the subject.

Prior to 1875 the Territories were but very sparsely populated, and outside of the Hudson's Bay Company posts, and the mission stations of various churches, the inhabitants were largely of nomadic and unsettled habits. Up to 1872 there was practically no Government, but in that year the Dominion Parliament, as already stated, passed an Act under which a Council was appointed to assist Lieut.-Governor Morris, of Manitoba, in governing the country. This Council, which was increased in numbers the next year, did some useful work in quieting the unrest of the Indians, policing the plains, keeping Montana whiskey-sellers in check, and protecting the buffalo for some time from extermination; but they did not take up any such question as education. There was no population to demand it, except as above stated, and the churches met the need. In 1866 the Presbyterian Church organized a school at Prince Albert, under Mr. Adam MacBeth, a teacher from the Red River country. When Chief Factor Christie came from the Mackenzie River District, a journey of some 2,000 miles and fifty-five days' duration, to Fort Garry, to attend a Council meeting in 1873, he made special mention of the flourishing Church of England mission and school at Fort Simpson, under Rev. (afterwards Bishop) Reeves. Mr. Christie also visited Providence and Isle à la Crosse, where he found Roman Catholic missions, and good work being done in schools for Indians and half-breeds by Sisters of Charity. The Methodist Church did practically the same kind of missionary and school work at different points as early as 1850. And thus the matter of education rested till 1880, when the Territorial Government, which had been established by Dominion Act in 1875, and given certain powers and duties in regard to education, took measures for the maintenance of schools. It will be well for us to follow the matter step by step from the date of this organization of government.

In 1875, by "The North-West Territories Act" (enacted by the Parliament of Canada) Rupert's Land and the North-Western Territory, except such portions thereof as formed the province of Manitoba and the district of Keewatin, were united in one district to be called and known as "The North-West Territories." The Lieutenant-Governor in Council was given such powers to make ordinances for the government of the North-West Territories as the Governor-in-Council from time to time conferred upon him; but such powers must not at any time be in excess of those conferred by the ninety-second and ninety-third sections of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, upon the legislatures of the several provinces of Canada. The creation of Separate Schools within these territories was provided for by Section 14 of this Act. It reads as follows: "The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education, but it shall therein always be provided that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Territories, or of any less portion or sub-division thereof, by whatever name the same is known, may establish such school therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor; and also that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein,—and in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic Separate Schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof."

The first steps taken by the civil authorities for the support of schools is set forth in a circular by Lieut.-Gov. Laird, December, 1880, in which it is announced that financial aid will be given to schools complying with certain conditions as to attendance of pupils. No reference is made to any class of school, separate or otherwise.

The formal establishment of the educational system of the Territories was accomplished by the Ordinance of 1885, passed by the North-West Council. As required by Section 14 of the N.W.T. Act, this Ordinance made provision for separate schools. Thus were established two classes of schools—Public and Separate—each being either Protestant or Roman Catholic. In no case was a Roman Catholic compelled to pay taxes to a Protestant school, or a Protestant to a Roman Catholic school. The Ordinance of 1886 contained an amendment making it unnecessary to designate public schools as Protestant or Roman Catholic.

This system was placed under the control of a Board of Education appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. It consisted of five persons, two Roman Catholics and three Protestants, with the Lieutenant-Governor as chairman. It controlled appointment of inspectors, granting of certificates to teachers, and the general organization of schools. It was required to resolve itself into two sections—a Protestant and a Roman Catholic section—each having under its control and management the schools of its section, and the selection of a uniform series of text-books for its schools.

In 1888 the number of members of the Board was increased to eight—five Protestants and three Roman Catholics. The Ordinance of 1891 amended and consolidated existing Ordinances. Of necessity it retained the original provisions for the establishment of separate schools.

By the Ordinance of 1892 the Board of Education was abolished, and a Council of Public Instruction constituted in its stead. It consisted of the members of the Executive Committee (Cabinet) and four persons—two Protestants and two Roman Catholics—appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. A member of the Executive Committee was the Chairman. All the powers and authority vested in the Board of Education, and in each section thereof, were vested in the new Council, that is, practically in the members of the Executive Committee, since the appointed members had no vote. The Regulations of the Council, August, 1893, provided, with slight exceptions, for uniformity in texts, courses of study, training of teachers, and inspection.

The Roman Catholics, being dissatisfied with the powers conferred upon the Council of Public Instruction, and with the Regulations framed by it, petitioned the Governor-General in Council, December, 1893, to disallow, repeal, or annul the Ordinance of 1892. A Committee of the Privy Council of Canada, after careful consideration of the petitions, documents and information supplied, found itself unable to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

In September, 1894, the North-West Assembly, after full consideration of the complaints preferred by the Roman Catholics, declined to change the system of inspection, to further extend the use of the French language in instruction, to abolish uniformity in text-books, or to change the mode of establishing separate schools.

The Ordinance of 1901, Chapters 29, 30 and 31, amended and consolidated existing Ordinances. Of necessity it retained the original provisions for the establishment of separate schools.

"The minority of the ratepayers in any district, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish a separate school therein; and in such case the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic School shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof." (Sec. 41.)

"After the establishment of a separate school district under the provisions of this Ordinance such separate school district and the Board thereof shall possess and exercise all rights, powers, privileges, and be subject to the same liabilities and method of government as is herein provided in respect of public school districts." (Sec. 45.)

By this Ordinance there was established a Department of Education, presided over by a member of the Government, with the title of Commissioner of Education. The Council of Public Instruction was abolished and an Educational Council created. The Department of Education has the control and management of all classes of schools. The Commissioner has the administration, control and management of the Department and the direction of its officials. With the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council he makes regulations for the organization and inspection of schools, the construction of school buildings, the examination and training of teachers, the management of libraries and teachers' institutes, and the authorization of text and reference books.

The Educational Council consists of five persons, at least two of whom must be Roman Catholics, appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The subjects for consideration by the Council include all general regulations respecting the inspection of schools, the examination, training, licensing, and grading of teachers, courses of study, teachers' institutes, text and reference books, and such other matters as may be referred to it by the Commissioner. It may also consider any question concerning the educational system of the Territories, and report thereon. Under the Ordinance it is the duty of the Council to advise, but the power to act is vested in the Commissioner; that is, in the Government.

All schools must be taught in the English language, but it is also permissible for a School Board to arrange for instruction in any language other than English, subject to the regulations of the Department.

It is permissible to open school by the recitation of the Lord's Prayer, but no religious instruction is permitted from the opening of school until one-half hour previous to its closing in the afternoon, after which time any such instruction permitted or desired by the local School Board may be given. Attendance is not compulsory during religious exercises.

In 1886, when the first official returns were made to the Board of Education, there were 76 schools in operation, with 2,553 pupils enrolled, and 84 teachers employed. At the close of 1903 there were 743 schools in operation, with 33,191 pupils enrolled, and 916 teachers employed. The gain recently has been very great. In 1903 there were erected 166 new districts, and 324 new districts in 1904. The growth of Separate Schools has been slow. Altogether there have been established sixteen such schools, Roman Catholic and Protestant, and but eleven are now in operation, two being Protestant.

From the first education has received close attention from the people and generous support from the Legislative Assembly. Good schools are everywhere available for the pioneer. In courses of study, qualifications of teachers, character of inspection, and thoroughness of work, the Public, High, and Normal Schools of the Territories compare favorably with those in the Provinces. Compulsory school libraries, teachers' institutes and reading-classes, manual training schools, and the most equitable and effective methods of distributing school grants in Canada, are features of which the people are proud.

From 1893 to 1902, inclusive, Dr. Goggin, formerly principal of the Manitoba Normal School, and one of the most widely-known educationists in Canada, was Superintendent of Education for the Territories. He was the guiding spirit in the development of education in the West during its formative period. To his energy, tact, technical skill and administrative powers are largely due the present advanced position in education, and the comparative smoothness with which the educational machinery has been working. It is quite well known that the satisfactory way in which things ran up to the close of the Territorial régime was a matter of wise regulations in the Department rather than a question of the ordinances in force.

And now we come to the most recent, but, as many think, not the final phase of the question. The question of the Territories entering into Confederation had often been discussed, and in March of the present year (1905), Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who had just been overwhelmingly sustained at a General Election, introduced the famous Autonomy Bill into the House of Commons. Though the autonomy question had been discussed, the character of the measure by which it would be inaugurated had not been before the public. Hence the appearance of the Bill with somewhat drastic clauses establishing a separate school system in the new Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan caused considerable surprise in all directions. The Premier's speech in bringing forward the Bill indicated a desire for a thorough-going system of Separate Schools with dogmatic religious instruction. This was generally resented by all parties except the Roman Catholics. Hon. Clifford Sifton, who had been the champion of Public Schools in Manitoba, was Minister of the Interior at the time, but was absent from the country when the Bill was framed and introduced. It appears that he was not consulted in the matter of the final framing of the school clauses, and as he could not agree with the proposed legislation he resigned office. The commotion became widespread and the Government bowed so far to the rising storm as to modify the proposed legislation into a shape which they and their supporters claim to mean simply the perpetuation in the new provinces of the educational system in vogue in the Territories under the Dominion Act of 1875, and accepted generally by the ordinances passed by the Local Assembly. Hon. Mr. Sifton said he would support the modified clauses, "though without much enthusiasm and with considerable reluctance." He claimed that under the amended clauses the schools would be Public Schools in every sense except that the principle of separate buildings was adopted. Rather than defeat the Government and precipitate an unhealthy agitation in the country, he would support the amended Bill, though he asserted his belief that the matter should have been left to the new Provinces.

Hon. F. W. G. Haultain, Premier of the Territories, took a strong stand against both the original and the modified clauses. He claimed that the people of the Territories should have an opportunity of pronouncing on the matter for themselves, and said they had not been consulted. He said further that he, although the official representative head of the people, had been kept in ignorance of the intentions of the Government. He urged that the action of the Dominion was a direct violation of the principles of provincial rights as guaranteed in the matter of education by the British North America Act. He claimed that the authority of the Dominion over the Territories, as exercised under the Act of 1875, was merely provisional, and that in matters reserved to the provinces by the constitution such authority should cease as soon as the Territories became provinces. He submitted that the new provinces should not be bound beforehand perpetually to a system without their own consent. If their own Assembly had passed ordinances practically recognizing Separate Schools they had done so of necessity under the provisional Dominion Act of 1875, which became law at a time when the Territories were unorganized and had no representatives in Parliament at Ottawa. It was generally admitted that the system of education in the Territories had been made to work well, but many felt that the autonomy clauses would open the door to sectarian aggression and at the same time would leave the people helpless for all time under a system which they had never inaugurated in the first place. On the other hand, Sir Wilfrid Laurier contended that the Roman Catholics should be protected in the rights they had enjoyed under the Act of 1875, and asserted that many had gone to the West under the impression that they were to have their own schools. The debate in the House of Commons was long and spirited.

Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the Opposition, moved that the matter be left to the new provinces, and based his position on the constitutional argument. Outside the House the discussion was equally active. The Toronto Globe, the leading Liberal paper of Canada, strongly opposed the Government on the ground of Provincial rights, and the Toronto News, ably edited by Mr. J. S. Willison, the biographer of Laurier, as an independent paper took a strenuous position in favor of popular rights, and urged that the Liberal leaders were deserting the most fundamental principle of their party. In answer to a question, Mr. Christopher Robinson, one of the highest legal authorities in Canada, held that the Dominion Government were under no necessity to pass the educational clauses in the Autonomy Bill. Prof. Goldwin Smith, eminent as a constitutional authority, wrote Mr. Bourassa, member for Labelle, that the authority of the Dominion over the Territories in the matter of education was provisional and should cease when they became provinces. Petitions came by shoals into the House of Commons, the large majority of which were against the Bill. On the other hand, it was pointed out that the Territories had prospered educationally under the old system, and were not making any violent demonstration against the proposed legislation. Mr. Frank Oliver, the popular pioneer member for Edmonton, was appointed Minister of the Interior, and was returned by acclamation, although he admitted with others that, owing to the nature of the population in his constituency, the election was no criterion of the general opinion of the Territories on the question. Sir Wilfrid Laurier stood to his guns, and as he commanded a large majority in the House, including all the members for Quebec but one, the Bill passed its second reading on May 3rd, 1905. It is therefore on the way to the Statute Book at the time of this writing, and will be entered therein ere long. But no one can forecast the future influence and effect on the Government and the country of the legislation thus passed. That it will be examined under the searchlight of the law courts seems certain. That the party passing it will meet it in future political conflicts is sure; but what the outcome will be it is not for the historian to predict. If a prolonged struggle, such as ensued over the Manitoba schools, should result, the consequences will be seriously inimical to the homogeneity and peace of the country.

British Columbia has exercised great wisdom in connection with educational matters. The people of that province were left free to deal with the subject in the terms of the constitution and they took hold of it with decisive ability. Accordingly that province has never been disturbed by any prolonged controversy on school matters, and any element that wished to introduce discord was promptly suppressed. The province, as mentioned in a preceding chapter, has hence missed the advertisement that came to some of her sisters in confederation through "school questions," but she has reaped a good reward in being able to build up a splendid educational system while at the same time keeping clear of dangerous sectarian strife. As a result her citizens live in the utmost harmony together and the question of a man's religious denomination is not considered in connection with his aspirations after public office, provided he is otherwise fitted for it. The province having thus settled satisfactorily this domestic problem, has been free to attend to other matters undisturbed by religious conflict.

The Hudson's Bay Company were the first sponsors of education in the old colony on Vancouver Island, although the schools first organized were under the care of their chaplains, who were clergymen of the Church of England. The first of these chaplains and teachers was the Rev. R. J. Staines, who with his wife arrived at Victoria in 1849, and with the assistance of the company organized a boarding-school. He was succeeded by the Rev. Edward (afterward Bishop) Cridge, who came to Victoria in 1855, and with Mrs. Cridge continued the work. Soon after this the Hudson's Bay Company established free Public Schools on Vancouver Island, with Mr. Cridge as Superintendent of Education. From a report he gave in 1861 to Governor Douglas there were three schools: Victoria (Mr. Barr, teacher), Craigflower (Mr. Claypole, teacher), and Nanaimo (with Mr. Bryant, afterwards the well-known Methodist minister, as teacher.)

In 1865 Mr. Alfred Waddington became superintendent, but matters were not flourishing. After the union of the island and mainland colonies in 1868 Governor Seymour, who succeeded Douglas, refused to grant financial aid to the schools, and several of them closed. In 1869 there were only eleven schools in the whole colony, seven on the island and one each at New Westminster, Langley, Yale and Sapperton. It is said that in that year not more than one-tenth of the children in the country had school opportunities.

But when the province came into confederation her legislature took vigorous hold of the subject. In 1872 an Act was passed organizing a non-sectarian Public School system, and this has remained undisturbed ever since. A Public School fund was set apart and a Board of Education appointed, with Mr. John Jessop as superintendent. In 1879 this Board was abolished and its duties transferred to the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. The Act of 1891 went still further in constituting the Executive Council a Council of Public Instruction, with full control over the schools of the province, except some local matters put in the hands of the trustees. There is a Minister of Education assisted by the Superintendent of Education. These do the executive work and have large powers, subject, of course, to the Council. The whole cost of maintaining the schools of the province is borne by the local government except where, since 1888, the cities are required to bear all expenses over and above the per capita grant they receive from the government. In this year, 1905, the Provincial Legislature has amended the Schools Act so as to make all municipalities in some degree liable for the direct support of their schools through taxation. High Schools have been founded in the chief centres of population, and these, as already stated, have affiliation with Eastern universities. A Normal School, with excellent staff, has been established, and the standard of education is steadily advancing each year to higher levels. Inspectors have been appointed to have the oversight of districts, under the superintendent, and the larger cities, like Victoria and Vancouver, have their own inspectors in charge of local work. The government of the province has always been disposed to deal liberally with schools, and the excellence of the school buildings would reflect credit on any country. At the present time of writing (1905) the question of a provincial university is again being discussed. It must come ere long. Eastern universities are in distance too far removed to be considered a permanent affiliation. Hundreds of young people in British Columbia are precluded, by the distance and expense, from taking a full university course. A province with such splendid natural resources could easily begin a university movement on a respectable scale. British Columbia owns her own lands and could easily provide an adequate and growing endowment. There is an opportunity for some Lieutenant-Governor in Council to take a place in history by launching the movement.

Out in the Yukon country, only settled a half dozen years, education has not been neglected. Schools have been built and liberal salaries given to competent teachers to go in and undertake the important task of training the youth of the mining districts. Thus does the temper of our Canadian civilization assert itself everywhere.

"In every instance Mr. MacBeth tells his story in happy terms, and supplies many details of the life of the settlers."—Royal Colonial Institute Journal.

"The author is a descendant of one of the hardy Scots who were in the Red River Valley a life-time before Riel was born. His story is the more romantic for its very simplicity."—St. John Sun.

"Not a dry collection of details, but an interesting account of the Settlement. . . . These experiences are unique. . . . Mr. MacBeth is to be congratulated on his book."—Canadian Magazine.

"A fascinating little volume, telling a tale that redounds to the honor of the Scottish race. . . . Mr. MacBeth's sketch gives a pleasing impression of the sterling worth and industry of the settlers."—Review of Historical Publications, Vol. II.

"A small but useful contribution to the history of the North-West. . . . Mr. MacBeth was brought up in the colony, and recalls some of its primitive laws, methods of agriculture and social customs, with a flavor of personal reminiscence."—Montreal Witness.

"The story of the Red River Settlement is one of unique interest. Its early days were a perfect Iliad of disaster. Flood, famine and hostile Indians sorely tried the faith and patience of the brave pioneers. A descendant of one of these tells in these pages the stirring story."—Onward.

Rev. Robert Murray, Editor of the Presbyterian Witness (Halifax, N.S.), writes the author: "Accept of my thanks for your most readable and refreshing book. I am delighted with it. Brought up among the Highlanders I appreciate some of the chapters more than others; but the book as a whole is excellent. I only wish it were ampler in its details."

"As the title indicates, the aim of the writer is to give to the people of to-day an idea of how the settlers lived in their homes, as apart from their struggles as a community for political and commercial rights. In this he has been eminently successful, and a valuable picture of the social life as it then was has been preserved for future generations."—Winnipeg Tribune.
